Taking shelter from the rockets

Residents of Kiryat Shmona were forced into their bomb shelters last week after Katyusha rockets were fired at their city from Lebanon. One house was badly damaged in the attack, but no one was injured. In response, the Israeli Air Force attacked a PFLP training base south of Beirut the next day. The Lebanese government criticized Hezbollah for launching the attack. [Isranet photo]

Israeli spies rap Munich

By DAN BARON
JTA

TEL AVIV — Fact may be stranger than fiction, but when it comes to espionage, fiction makes for better storytelling.

That was the conclusion drawn by many veterans of, and experts on, the Israeli intelligence service Mossad when they heard about Steven Spielberg's new thriller Munich, which open last month in North America.

"The basis for this film has no relation to reality, though it may be a cracking tale," said Eitan Haber, a Mossad historian.

In his portrayal of the Mossad's retaliation for the Palestinian terrorist attack on its athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics, Spielberg has drawn on George Jonas' book Vengeance, despite the fact it has been discredited in Israel and abroad.

The killing of senior Palestinians blamed for the Munich massacre – in a series of shootings, booby-trap bombings and commando raids in Europe and the Middle East – is beyond dispute.

What irks those few Israelis with direct knowledge of the top-secret missions is the way Spielberg's Mossad hit team functions, a depiction they say owes more to a romantic idea of the Zionist fighting ethos than to accurate historical research.

"The modus operandi is entirely wrong," said Gad Shimron, a former Mossad operative turned journalist.

Spielberg insists that he consulted with a former Israeli agent for Munich, and he opens the film with the disclaimer that it was inspired by real events.

Like Vengeance, Spielberg's film focuses on an Israeli assassin, Avner, who suffers a crisis of conscience over his country's reprisal policy.

20 Quebec groups urge Israel boycott

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Twenty Quebec organizations, including the Fédération des Femmes du Québec (FFQ) and the provincial union of CEGEP teachers, have endorsed a new campaign to boycott Israeli products and companies deemed to be supporting the Jewish state's "apartheid politics."

They are protesting Israel's "occupation" of Palestinian territory, the West Bank security fence and alleged Israeli violations of international law.

Jewish community officials did not react and, in fact, were not aware of the campaign at first, because its launch received no mainstream media coverage.

"I think that's the most eloquent statement – that there was no media coverage. I would call that a catastrophic failure," said Sara Saber-Freedman, the Montreal-based chief executive officer of the Canada-Israel Committee.

She doubts the campaign will have a practical impact or generate sympathy among the Quebec public.

"While not minimizing the seriousness, my sense is [boycotts] tend not to get much traction. There have been attempts like this in the past and they have settled down… Nevertheless, it is deplorable, reprehensible and wrong-headed… There is no question this kind of thing is not good for Israel and has to be countered."

FFQ president Michèle Asselin and actress/singer Carmen Ferlan, president of Les Artistes pour la Paix, were among the speakers at a media conference launching the proposed boycott, which is being led by the Coalition pour la Justice et la Paix en Palestine.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Rabbi Speaks to Iran

TORONTO — A leading Conservative rabbi in Toronto called for more interfaith dialogue among Canadian Muslims and Jews in an interview with a Tehran-based news agency last week. Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of Beth Tzedec Congregation, Canada's largest shul, told the Iranian Quran News Agency that Jews and Muslims should see themselves as children of Abraham. "We should look for ways to overcome our differences while remaining true to who we are," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said, repeating a message he delivered earlier in the week at the fourth annual Reviving the Islamic Spirit Convention, attended by 12,000 North American Muslims last month in Toronto.

Critics Assail Museum

WINNIPEG — A coalition calling for a national museum to commemorate all genocides is questioning Gov.-Gen. Michaëlle Jean's backing of a proposed human rights museum in Winnipeg because they say it will put too much focus on the Holocaust at the expense of other human rights abuses. Canadians for a Genocide Museum (CGM) – which says it represents 43 groups, including Greek, Ukrainian and Arab ones – wrote to Jean last month with their objections, the Globe and Mail reported. The Canadian Human Rights Museum was the idea of the late media mogul Israel Asper, founder of CanWest Global Communications, and his family is backing the $311 million project. Ottawa has pledged $100 million to it and Jean has agreed to be its patron. CGM wants the museum to be independent of the Asper family, its secretary James Kafieh, a former head of the Canadian Arab Federation, told the Globe.

Zundel Loses Case

TORONTO — Ernst Zundel's $10-million lawsuit against Ottawa for unlawful detention and deportation has been dismissed, and he was ordered to pay the Crown's costs. The Nazi propagandist said the two years he spent in jail under a security certificate was unconstitutional, but the Federal Court said he had no basis for that claim. In March, he was removed to Germany, where he was charged with inciting racial hatred. His trial was postponed when the judge fired his defence team for including a far-right figure.

WORLD

Manor in Court

TEL AVIV — Boaz Manor, co-founder of the failed hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management, made his first appearance in court last week as part of an effort by receiver KPMG to locate $800 million in missing investor assets. The closed-door hearing in Tel Aviv lasted more than two hours, the Globe and Mail reported. The OSC has laid three charges each against Manor and Portus co-founder Michael Mendelson, saying they destroyed documents and improperly sold products to investors. Manor, who fled to Israel last March when the Toronto-based firm collapsed, denies wrongdoing and has said he's mentally ill and can't answer questions.

N.O. Chanukah Relief

NEW ORLEANS — Scores of Jewish volunteers were in New Orleans over Chanukah to help clean up and provide services in areas devastated by Hurricane Katrina. Students on a Chabad Lubavitch-organized trip helped clean homes, shuls and schools, while a dozen Jewish communities donated more than 500 chanukiyot and dreidels to area families, and the American Jewish Committee donated $575,000 (US) from its Hurricane Katrina Relief Fund to four institutions. As well, a group of 18 Reform Jews, including several teens and their families, was in the city helping to repair homes. They were part of the Adult Mitzvah Corps project sponsored by the Union for Reform Judaism and Temple Shalom in Succasunna, N.J.

Comic Loses Lawsuit

PARIS — A French comic who tried to suppress passages in a new book about his anti-Semitic remarks has lost his case on appeal. Dieudonné Mbala Mbala, who has been repeatedly sued for his anti-Semitic comments, had won a case against publishing house Editions Plon, which recently published The Truth About Dieudonné, a book with passages discussing Holocaust denial and anti-Semitism in Dieudonné's comedy routines. Plon appealed and last month won the right to reprint the book with the suppressed passages. It plans to promote the edition as "the book Dieudonné wanted to censor."

Deportation Allowed

CLEVELAND — A U.S. judge ruled last week that John Demjanjuk can be deported to his native Ukraine. Chief U.S. Immigration Judge Michael Creppy rejected Demjanjuk's contention he would be tortured in Ukraine. Demjanjuk, 85, can appeal. Demjanjuk, who lives near Cleveland, was a guard at the Sobibor, Majdanek and Flossenburg camps, but lied about his past when he applied to enter the United States in 1952. In 1993, he was acquitted in Israel of being "Ivan the Terrible," a notorious Nazi guard.

Czechs Reportedly Talked Nukes With Iran

PRAGUE — Czech government officials secretly negotiated with Iran on possible co-operation with the Islamic regime's nuclear program, a Czech newspaper reported.

Industry and Trade Minister Milan Urban said he discussed aiding Iran's civilian nuclear aims during trade talks in early December, and top Czech politicians – including Prime Minister Jiri Paroubek – secretly negotiated with Iranian deputies on possible co-operation shortly before Iran's president called for the destruction of Israel, Respekt reported.

Their actions were condemned by the newspaper and by Jana Hybaskova, a pro-Israel Czech member of the European Parliament, and Josef Jarab, head of the Czech Senate's foreign affairs committee. Jarab was one of several legislators who refused to meet their Iranian counterparts.

Tomas Kraus, head of the Federation of Jewish Communities in the Czech Republic, expressed astonishment at the prospect of a Czech official discussing a commercial nuclear deal with Iran. Paroubek admitted to Respekt that as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad continued making outrageous anti-Israel statements, "maybe doing business" with Iran on nuclear power "would be a problem right now."

Edmonton shul struck by vandals on Chanukah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An Edmonton synagogue that was the subject of an arson attack five years ago was vandalized with anti-Semitic graffiti last week.

Worshippers attending services at the Beth Shalom Synagogue on the morning of Dec. 25, prior to the onset of Chanukah, noticed a large black swastika drawn on the shul's west wall next to the acronym, ZOG, which was crossed out. ZOG stands for Zionist occupation (or occupied) government and is a term employed by white supremacists who believe Western governments are controlled by Jews.

"People are disturbed that these kinds of things could happen in Canada," said Rabbi David Kunin, spiritual leader of the synagogue. "It does not reflect what Canada is about but is an aberration."

Police were called to the scene and were given a digital copy of data collected by the synagogue's security cameras. "Hopefully, the tapes will reveal some information," Rabbi Kunin said.

Const. David Huggins of the Edmonton Police Service's hate crimes unit told reporters that they "haven't seen too many [cases] of graffiti where ZOG is used. The acronym is quite unique, but not the idea."

The western wall of Edmonton's Beth Shalom.

He declined to release details of the tapes, saying that might compromise the investigation.

The Edmonton hate crimes unit has recorded some successes recently. It laid the groundwork for the conviction last month of Reinhard Gustav Mueller for promoting hatred of Jews on an Internet website. Rabbi Kunin said there was no evidence to link that case with the synagogue vandalism, nor with an incident a few months ago when paint balls were hurled at the house of worship.

Rabbi Kunin said news of the vandalism prompted an outpouring of support from the broader community. In addition to receiving numerous phone messages, on Dec. 26, about 20 clergy and political leaders gathered outside the Jasper Avenue synagogue to stand in solidarity with the Jewish community. Representatives of Christian, Sikh and Muslim communities attended along with members of the legislative assembly and former senator Doug Roche, Rabbi Kunin stated.

In addition, Prime Minister Paul Martin condemned the anti-Semitic attack while attending a Chanukah celebration in Montreal.

"This is not Canada, what happened in Edmonton," the prime minister said. "Let us understand that and we will condemn it with every fibre of our being."

Edmonton Mayor Stephen Mandel, who is Jewish, commended the response of the city's religious community. "A great deal of credit has to go through to the leadership of each of those groups who have come together on an ongoing basis to make sure things like that don't happen. And if they do happen, they speak with one voice," he told the Edmonton Journal.

Rabbi Kunin suggested an education program directed at young people would prove useful. "What we're looking at is to build stronger community relations and teach young people this is not what Canada is about. Canada is a country that respects diversity and multi-ethnicity," he said.

Can this message bring peace?

From the editor's desk

If peace, rather than merely an end to the conflict, is ever to emerge between Israelis and Palestinians, all the educational instruments – broadly defined to include religious, cultural, political, media, labour, military, medical institutions and, of course, schools – will have to be mobilized to inculcate into Palestinian society values of tolerance and acceptance toward Jews and their right to live in Israel.

Even if the massive educational effort were to begin this month, it would take years, indeed even decades, to plant the seeds and sow the harvest of bona fide feelings of neighbourliness toward Israelis.

But such a harvest seems far away. For there is scant evidence that any seeds are being planted.

Even Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, in whom Israel and the European Union have placed so much hope, is equivocal and ambivalent toward the Israelis.

It is true that he telephoned Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to convey his best wishes to Sharon after the Israeli leader suffered a mild stroke.

But it is also true that he has never condemned Palestinian violence as unjustified or wrong or immoral or otherwise odious in its own right. Rather, he has always criticized the violence as being inimical to Palestinian interests. Indeed last week after the barrage of Qassam rockets from the Gaza Strip toward Ashkelon, those were his precise words. He condemned the rockets as being "against Palestinian interests."

The "ordinary" Palestinian would undoubtedly fully understand the intended nuanced meaning of so vacuous a condemnation of violence. With no example of positive attitudinal change toward the Israelis emanating from the highest elected political office, is it any wonder, then, that there is so little change in the vast mainstream of Palestinian society?

And we have not even taken into account the unalterably murderous attitude toward Israel and its Jews by the fundamentalist Islamic groups within that society.

Itamar Marcus and Barbara Crook of Palestinian Media Watch, based in Jerusalem, carefully monitor the content of newspaper, radio and television programming in the media outlets under Palestinian auspices. Last week, they reported on the broadcast of a dismaying message toward Jews in a Palestinian television program about the city of Jaffa that was telecast on Dec. 20.

"It is time for you [Israelis] to be gone. Live wherever you like, but don't live among us. It is time for you to be gone. Die wherever you like, but don't die among us. We have the past here. We have the present, the present and the future. So leave our country, our land, our sea, our wheat, our salt, our wounds. Everything. And leave the memories."

Marcus and Crook provided the context of the program's message. "These words of hate are the parting moments of yet another program on Palestinian Authority television calling for the destruction of Israel. The words, calling for the expulsion of every last Israeli from Israel, are spoken while the screen is showing Jaffa-Tel Aviv, Israelis and Israeli flags. Official PA TV has aired this twice in recent months."

The message unsubtly echoes the views of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who believes with all his heart that the Jews do not belong in the Middle East. Sadly, the Palestinian and Iranian messages are the same.

Only the Palestinians can reform their own society. It is wrong, if not also disingenuous, to suggest that the Israelis can bring about that change. But where are the signs that the majority of Palestinians even want to?

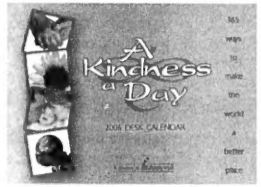
Anyone still looking for a calendar for the new year might consider acquiring A Kindness a Day 2006 Calendar: 365 Ways to Make the World a Better Place.

It is both functional and inspiring.

Published by the New-York based, non-profit organization Areyvut, the calendar comes in a 4.5-by-5.5 inch, flip-top, one-day-per-page format.



Each day is noted in both the Gregorian and Hebrew calendars and the entry in the calendar provides a suggested act of kindness for that day, as well as a reference from classic Jewish sources.

The closest approximation in English for the meaning of the Hebrew word areyvut in this context is mutual responsibility.

Some readers might be familiar with the rule of life propounded by our ancient sages, "Kol Yisrael arevim zeh lazeh," which means "All the people of Israel are responsible for each other."

Established in 2002, Areyvut uses the very meaning of its name as its mission statement. It reaches out to Jewish day schools, congregations and communities regardless of affiliation.

The calendar it has produced is handy and pleasant, and is quite possibly a modest, uncomplicated route to improving oneself along with the world. It is available through Amazon.com, JudaicaPress.com, Areyvut.org and local Jewish book and gift stores.

Centre helps vision-impaired gain independence

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

There are more than 20,000 blind and vision-impaired men, women and children in Israel, but not enough resources to help them, Rena Cohen says.

Cohen, the director of development for Beit Yael, the Center for the Advancement for the Blind in Safed, said she is frustrated by the lack of support her organization receives.

"Part of the problem is that when people do become blind, they have no idea what their resources are, what is available for them," said Cohen, who was in Toronto recently to raise awareness of the centre. "There are few social workers working with the blind in Israel who really have the ability or the time to function with the blind.

"I'm trying to commission Partnership 2000 people in the different locations [to help]."

Under the Partnership 2000 program launched by the Jewish Agency for Israel in 1994, communities in Israel are twinned with cities in the Diaspora, with the goal of strengthening Israeli society.

But the organization is not interested in educating the blind, she said.

"Part of our mission is to try to make the Partnership 2000 communities aware of the needs of people within their communities who, until now, have been completely overlooked," said Cohen, who was the first Canadian to make aliyah after the Gulf War 15 years ago. She has been working for Beit Yael for six years.

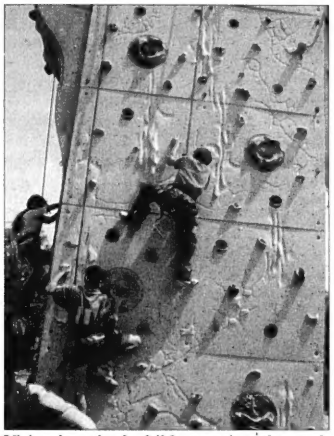
Beit Yael, which has been offering resources to help the blind gain their independence for more than 30 years, provides services that are unlike anything else in Israel or many other places in the world, she said.

"Our challenge is to empower people who are vision-impaired, whether they were born that way [or] they have become that way, and to make them capable of functioning on a dynamic basis.

"We empower people by teaching them how to walk with a cane, teaching them how to cook, teaching them to take care of themselves on a physical level and just become independent," Cohen said.

Among the services the centre offers are counselling and guidance, research, early detection and rehabilitation of blind and vision-impaired newborns, a Hebrew ulpan for low-vision and blind immigrants, and crafts and activities for the elderly with sight problems.

Beit Yael, which is strictly kosher, offers two residential programs each year, a study camp for children age nine to 13 and a residential rehabilitation program for adults over 40. Both programs run from Sunday to Thursday so that participants can go home for the weekends to experience Shabbat with their families, Cohen said.



Vision-impaired children enjoy the rock climbing wall at the summer camp program offered by Beit Yael.

She described the summer camp program. "There are about 900 vision-impaired kids in Israel of whom about 300 live in the north. We want them to have a fun kind of camp just like sighted kids.

"So we take them boating, rafting, horseback riding, on jeep tours, and we have access to a therapeutic swimming pool... They just have a wonderful time."

Although it costs about $400 to send a child to the camp, the child is only responsible for $60 and the centre raises the rest. Beit Yael gets some support from the Ministry of Social Affairs of the Israeli Government, but it relies heavily on private donations, Cohen said.

The residential rehabilitation program runs once a year, she said. "For one month, people come to live with us from Sunday to Thursday. We can take 15 people and we start with the very basics. These are people who are newly blind or going blind. There are about 2,000 people who fall into this category each year."

Once the participants are screened to ensure they are mentally prepared and are genuinely interested in the program, teachers provided by Migdal Ohr (Hebrew for "lighthouse"), an Israeli organization that provides education and social guidance to the underprivileged, begin to teach them how to cope with their disability.

"It is an incredibly rewarding job because on a daily basis, you see how important what we are doing is and the impact we have in people's lives," Cohen said, adding that about 200 people have gone through the program successfully.

"Now I have glaucoma, and I'm even more aware of the challenges faced by people who wake up one morning and don't know they have had it. It is so important to get your eyes checked," Cohen advised.

For more information about the centre, visit www.beityael.org.

High-profile candidates square off in St. Paul's

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

It's always humbling to re-apply for a job, says Carolyn Bennett, the incumbent MP in St. Paul's, but she's confident her constituents want her back.

Election 2006

"Some people don't want to hear about another election, but I'm pleased in terms of their support [of the Liberals]," said Bennett, a family physician who is seeking her fourth term.

Her opponents are broadcaster Peter Kent for the Conservatives, economist Paul Summerville for the New Democratic Party, and Kevin Farmer for the Green Party.

In the 2004 election, Bennett beat her nearest competitor, Conservative candidate Barry Cline, by 20,945 votes, but this year's vote could be much closer, as both Kent and Summerville are high-profile candidates.

This affluent mid-town riding includes Forest Hill and multicultural neighbourhoods along St. Clair Avenue. It's bordered by the CP Rail line, Yonge Street, Rosehill Reservoir and Moore Avenue in the south and Eglinton Avenue West, Yonge Street and Broadway Ave in the north. It also lies between Bayview Avenue in the east and Ossington Avenue, Winona Drive, Holland Park Avenue, Rogers Road and Dufferin Street in the west.

Considered a federal bellwether, St. Paul's has the second-highest average family income in Canada, a large Jewish community, and 36 per cent of its residents are immigrants, according to the 2001 census.

Bennett, appointed minister of state for public health in 2003, has served as chair of the standing joint committee on the Library of Parliament, the human resources sub-committee on the status of persons with disabilities and the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group.

Long considered a friend of Israel, Bennett said the two countries have a "robust relationship on so many files."

"Plans are on the way for a Canada centre for peace and democracy in the Middle East, and we're able to be helpful behind the scenes in the region. Our relationship with Israel is not foreign affairs, it is family," she added.

"With regard to [Canada's UN General Assembly votes on annual Arab-sponsored resolutions on Israel], there has been progress, but but we know that ritualized anti-Jewish resolutions have to stop," Bennett said, referring to recent change in Canada's voting pattern at the world body.

An issue close to her constituents' heart is health care, she said. "Wait times have been a talisman, but they are shrinking. Pandemic preparation and integrated disease strategy have been a fabulous beginning. Prevention of disease is the ultimate solution to wait times."

She said highlights of her party's 10-year plan to strengthen health care include shorter wait times, more doctors and nurses, expanded home care, and a national drug plan.

Another issue of concern to people in her riding is the funding of private faith-based schools, but she said, "I believe in a publicly funded system with a curriculum that teaches equity and fairness."

Alluding to the Conservative promise to give money directly to parents for child care, she said the Liberals' national child care plan also has "flexibility" in that it "allows for the ability to fund small boutique centres [aimed at a specific heritage] such as Jewish or French."

Kent, a longtime broadcast journalist who has covered stories at home and abroad for CTV, Global, CBC and NBC, said he believes "society is evolving and so should education. The [Ontario policy of only funding Catholic and public schools] is anachronistic and offensive in today's multicultural environment. What is good for two groups should be good for all."

The Tories' first step in improving health care would involve getting "billions of federal tax dollars back into Ontario. We have to overhaul fiscal federalism," Kent said.

"We will work with the provinces to develop a health care guarantee that ensures patients receive essential medical treatment within clinically acceptable waiting times."

Hospitals have a huge amount of money tied up in bricks and mortar, he said. "If we could use this money on programs, the waiting list would be down and health care would be better."

On the issue of child care, Kent said that "the $1,200 a year [per child] we've promised to each family with children under six, regardless of income, allows for unorthodox childcare. It doesn't involve cost-heavy bureaucracy, but it recognizes that parents are the experts in deciding what is best for their children."

Kent, who has covered Israel several times in his almost 40 years in broadcast journalism – "including both intifadahs" – said Canada needs to stand up for the only democracy in the Middle East.

He accused Prime Minister Paul Martin of having a "fuzzy foreign policy that is soft on terrorism."

Summerville, an investment banker and former chief economist at RBC Dominion Securities who as a student in 1978 spent a year at Hebrew University in Jerusalem on scholarship, says that anti-Semitism in the Middle East today "is as virulent and potentially lethal as [it was in Europe in the 1920s.]

"When a leader can stand up and talk about its neighbour Israel in public and say it should be wiped off the map, that tells you something," he said, referring to recent comments by Iran's president.

Canada must guarantee the security of Israel, Summerville said, "because without it there will be no peace."

He said the NDP stresses that a strong economy and social justice are two sides of the same coin. "The investment we make in education, health care and public transportation is key to social justice."

The NDP will defend public health care in the next Parliament, he said, by refusing to permit the dismantling of Canada's single-payer medicare system; by prohibiting the use of federal transfers to subsidize a new, profit-making private insurance system covering medically necessary services; and by ensuring that no federal money is used to cover the salaries or costs of doctors or other medical personnel involved in a new, separate, profit-making private insurance system.

On the issue of funding private schools, Summerville said, "Our society is not tribal, and we should celebrate our differences. A number of faiths are represented in our public schools and we should celebrate that. [That can only be done by supporting a public system.]"

As Abbas weakens, extremists gain

The beginning of a new year is often accompanied by looking toward new possibilities and a sense of optimism. But optimism is decidedly not the prevailing mood in the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians. Indeed, there is an ominous feeling that the possibility of peaceful coexistence between the two societies, at least in the near future, is slipping away.

Anarchy is quickly encroaching upon the Palestinian-controlled territories. They are, alas, in the main, already lawless places. Last week's blotter of criminal activities included the following partial list of incidents:

• Three British citizens were kidnapped by armed Palestinian thugs in the Gaza Strip. They were the latest in a wave of kidnappings of foreign nationals there. Palestinian Authority police officers set up roadblocks throughout the area – not unlike the Israelis – to try to find the missing Britons.

• Shooting erupted near PA President Mahmoud Abbas' home in Gaza during a funeral for a police officer who was killed in clashes that erupted between two rival families.

• A Palestinian suicide bomber was thwarted in his attempt to penetrate into Israel near Tulkarm to perpetrate his bloodlust atrocity upon innocent Israeli civilians. But the Israeli army officer who stopped him at the roadblock, Lt. Uri Binamo, 21, was killed along with two other Palestinians.

• Palestinians launched a barrage of Qassam rockets toward Ashkelon and other parts of Israel from northern Gaza.

There is also distressing evidence that radical extremism is increasingly taking root in Palestinian society. Palestinian Media Watch reported that a poll conducted among Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza by Fafo, a Norwegian-based NGO, "to assess political feelings after Israel's voluntary withdrawal from Gaza," found that 65 per cent of Palestinians "support Al Qaeda actions in the USA and Europe." The poll results appeared in the PA daily Al-Hayat Al-Jadida on Dec. 23.

Abbas' refusal to assert control over the gangs of thugs and fundamentalist zealots who brutalize Palestinian society has weakened both his authority and that of the Palestinian National Council. Indeed, Abbas is openly ridiculed within his own Fatah party by its younger members. They even temporarily submitted a separate, breakaway list of Fatah party candidates for the upcoming national elections.

But the loss is not to Abbas' authority and prestige alone. It is also to his people, to the possibility that they could imminently build a society governed by the rule of law. And that is a great pity. For once again, the Palestinian leadership is squandering the opportunity that Israel and history have placed before them. Israel cannot be expected to come to an agreement on which the safety of its own citizens depends with a Palestinian governing authority that does not, or cannot, govern.

The situation leaves little room for optimism at the start of this new year.

Rabbi Creditor 'has it all wrong'

In "Conservative rabbi's comment sparks outrage" (CJN, Dec. 22) Rabbi Menachem Creditor is quoted as follows: "I believe that a movement that espouses conscious change of tradition as part and parcel of tradition cannot advocate change, legitimize a moral response to a question, and then allow the inherited tradition which posed the problem to remain a legitimate option." In my humble opinion, he has it all wrong.

The responses given to questions of Jewish law in the Conservative movement are halachic responses. Going back to the earliest of talmudic authorities, we have lived legitimately with competing interpretations of Halachah on many issues, be they moral, sociological, economic, ritualistic or otherwise. His seeming understanding of an absolute morality for the movement is the antithesis of Conservative Judaism. The inherited tradition on so many topics continues to be morally and halachically sound for many members of Conservative Judaism, as well as the larger group, Clal Yisrael, which according to Rabbi Solomon Schechter and Rabbi Robert Gordis meant all Jews who are committed to the authority of Jewish law.

Has Rabbi Creditor excluded from the halachic world not only non-egalitarian Conservative Jews but also the various segments of Orthodoxy? Are they, too, immoral in his opinion? Or are they given a deeper measure of sensitivity because they are aligned with different institutions?

Overreaction to Rabbi Creditor

As an ordained Conservative rabbi who grew up in Toronto and yet is not counted in most minyanim in Conservative synagogues in my home city, including the synagogue where I grew up, I am dismayed and troubled by Paul Kochberg's overreaction to Rabbi Menachem Creditor's challenge to non-egalitarian synagogues ("Conservative rabbi's comment sparks outrage," CJN, Dec. 22). For let us be quite honest: given that the essential characteristic of Conservative Judaism is its commitment to an evolving Halachah, the absolute refusal of some Conservative rabbis to acknowledge that our understanding of Halachah has indeed evolved when it comes to the inclusion of women in minyanim is experienced not by a few of us, and certainly not by Rabbi Creditor alone, as fundamentally based less on religious scruples than on an insistence on the preservation of male privilege – in other words, misogyny.

An Orthodox synagogue that makes no claims to evolving Halachah at least has a certain integrity. A synagogue that maintains membership in a movement that ordains women as rabbis and yet refuses to include them in a minyan, with its obligations and its privileges, is just insulting and hurtful.

Before Kochberg continues to denounce a rabbi who had the courage to speak words many of us have felt in our hearts, I would urge him to take some time to speak with Canadian Conservative women rabbis to find out the spiritual and familial costs of the exclusionary policies he so adamantly defends.

Support for 'Jewish Singles World'

I was dismayed to read about the problems that Judith Weinroth and Jerry Maser were facing in finding funding for their proposed "Jewish Singles World" ("Media blitz proposed to halt population decline," CJN, Dec. 8). Surely it is the responsibility of the organized Jewish community to support and fund "Jewish Singles World."

We are so terrific in raising money for buildings. We improved the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at Bloor and Spadina. We will be rebuilding the Jewish Community Centre on Bathurst Street. We will be building the new Lebovic Jewish Campus in Vaughan. Wonderful!

But where will the Jews come from to use these remarkable facilities? The Toronto Jewish community is not growing – in fact, it is declining.

We grew when the Montreal Jews came to Toronto. We grew when the Russian Jews came to Toronto. Where will our future come from?

We must find a way for 56,000 Jewish singles in Toronto to meet, fall in love, marry and have children.

Several years ago, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto set aside funds for a new initiative – Jewish continuity. Isn't "Jewish Singles World" what continuity is all about? Accordingly, it seems to me that support for "Jewish Singles World" must come from the federation, and we must start now.

Ahmadinejad 'needs a trip to Auschwitz'

I am a Grade 12 student at Ulpanat Orot Girls' School. I cannot begin to believe how Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad could do something as absurd as even attempting to deny the Holocaust ("Political leaders condemn Iranian president," CJN, Dec. 22). How does he account for the loss of more than six million lives? I was a participant on the March of the Living this past May and visited numerous concentration camps. My grandfather was a Holocaust survivor. How dare someone deny such an atrocity such as this where more than six million Jews perished! I believe he needs a trip to Auschwitz.

World Jewry today: a demographic snapshot

By LEO DAVIDS

Demographers are social scientists who study population changes and try to explain why they have happened. Jewish demographers, in particular, examine trends in the number of Jews in various countries or cities, with a view to understanding what is causing increases or declines in those totals. This essay will provide a brief overview of how Jewish demographers obtain their data, and it will also look at the shifting balance between Israeli Jewry and the Diaspora, as well as what's been happening demographically in the world Jewish family in general and Canadian Jewry in particular.

There are many data sources for this field of scientific focus, some more reliable and believable than others. The published information from Israel is very important and credible in knowing about the Jews there, as well as about aliyah to the Jewish state. For everywhere else, there is a mix of sources, including governmental data such as censuses (in Canada, one occurs every five years) and marriage records, plus Jewish communal sources such as day school enrolment figures, Jewish federation reports, academic surveys and so on.

Sometimes, one must supplement those numbers with a little guesstimation. Although one can't be sure about every detail, or about some Jewish communities where solid information is not available, there is no doubt about the overall world situation. As well, we know something about the relevant trends for Canada as a whole, and for Canadian Jews in particular.

A great deal of demographic information from every reasonable source finds its way to Hebrew University in Jerusalem, where it is extensively studied at the Institute for Contemporary Jewry. Well-known scholars such as Prof. Sergio Della Pergola are in touch with all major Jewish communities around the world, and they provide annual overviews on the Jewish population picture that try to deal with current realities and the underlying factors and causes involved, as well as project what is expected for the various cities and countries throughout the Diaspora. Although there are always problems with missing or unreliable information when these analyses and forecasts are prepared, experts in the field are confident that the "big picture" is clear, based on the available scientific evidence.

One key fact about the world's Jewish population is the increasing proportion of Israeli Jews compared to Jews in the rest of the world (what we call the Diaspora). In 1948, when the modern Jewish state was established, the Jewish population there was a tiny fraction of the world's Jewish population. Only about five per cent of world Jewry lived in Israel at that time. However, continuing aliyah from many sources – such as the displaced persons camps of post-Holocaust Europe, Jews fleeing from Arab countries such as Iraq, and a small numbers of idealistic Zionists from North America and other prosperous lands – has boosted the number and percentage of Jews in Israel compared to the rest of the world.

Recently, close to one million immigrants arrived from the former Soviet Union (not all of whom are Jewish). The bottom-line result of these population flows is a Jewish population in Israel that stands today at about 5.25 million people and constitutes not less than 40 per cent of the world's Jews, and it is growing steadily. Given the ongoing shrinkage of Jewish populations elsewhere, which we will be discussing shortly, it's anticipated that Israeli Jews will constitute more than 50 per cent of the world's total quite soon, probably within the next decade.

What is the big picture concerning Jewish population in the Diaspora? To be brief about it, the numbers are not very encouraging. The overwhelming majority of Diaspora communities are facing serious population declines, as the number of deaths is greater than the number of births. This is not the case in Israel, where the Jewish and other populations continue to grow. But in New York, Miami or Montreal, the Jewish family is losing ground and the population is either static or shrinking.

Why is this happening?

The major literature studying these issues tells us that the trends toward late marriage, small families, same-sex and other alternative family forms, more divorce, and other such life choices now common throughout the developed world are also appearing strongly among Jews. Although the Orthodox and haredi sectors appear to be somewhat immune to these phenomena, most younger Jews are very much part of the societies they live in, and they have participated fully in the cultural movements and trends of recent years. The Orthodox and haredi sectors live by different values, however, and are producing a growing percentage of Diaspora Jewish children.

Young Canadians visit Israel under the auspices of birthright Israel, a successful program which the author points to as an example of communal leaders taking new approaches to the problems facing world Jewry. [Israel photo]

So, a major part of the story we hear in Jewish population reports is simply the Jewish angle on what is going on throughout the nations and cultures of the developed world.

On the other hand, a big part of our story has to do with intermarriage. As readers of The CJN know, Jews have been increasingly marrying "out" in most countries over the past century. Nowadays, this is very common and well-tolerated by most people and communities, and rarely does anyone really demand or expect the conversion of a gentile partner. Whereas there was once much distress and resistance when intermarriage was pending, most Jewish parents today take such news without visible agitation or unhappiness, and few of us are particularly upset at incorporating non-Jews into our families. About half of American Jews now marry an unconverted non-Jewish partner.

From a population standpoint, all this is not good news. Years ago, some researchers thought we might break even as a result of intermarriage trends, gaining about as many Jewish grandchildren as we lose. But more recent studies indicate that we are losing ground in these transactions: most children and grandchildren of mixed unions (that is, with no conversion) consider themselves not Jewish, whatever their halachic status may be. In reality, therefore, the trend toward the free choice of marriage partners and mates has cost us dearly at the collective level, as the number of Jewish offspring declines. Converts to Judaism have long been appreciated, but the general absence of such a commitment these days means population shrinkage for the Jewish people.

The double whammy of high intermarriage and low birth rates, it must be remembered, is largely a Diaspora reality. In Israel, births are far greater in number, and marrying out of the faith is not common among Jews. Thus, the Jewish demographic picture in Israel is generally positive, and there are more Jews there every year due to natural increase, apart from immigration.

But what is the Jewish population situation here in Canada?

For Canada as a whole, population shrinkage is a constant threat, as both the national birth and marriages rates are at historic lows, and immigration accounts for some two-thirds of current overall population growth. As well, the average age of Canadian society is rising, as is the case in all industrialized societies.

Canada's Jewish population is also not growing, despite a small flow of immigrants to our Canadian communities. Between 1991 and 2001, the number of people in Canada citing Judaism as their religion rose by less than four per cent, which is not much over a 10-year span. Jews from Argentina, France, Iran and other countries are still coming here, but not in large numbers. We are coping quite well with these new arrivals, but they are not changing the overall Jewish population picture at present. The number of deaths in our community is about the same as (or slightly higher than) the number of births, so the total Jewish population is going in the same direction as the population of Canada as a whole – toward shrinkage in the near future without immigration to sustain it. However, Canada is maintaining its demographic health by receiving hundreds of thousands of immigrants each year, while the number of immigrants to our Jewish community is nowhere near that.

So, the underlying cultural and domestic realities for Jewish demography are well known: many mature singles who are not producing offspring; two-career, highly educated couples with small families; many young, Canadianized Jews who marry gentile classmates from high school, university, or professional circles; and a lack of interest among younger parents in things Jewish.

The insanely high cost of a Jewish day school education is certainly not helping matters, particularly as a majority of Canadian Jewish children live in the Toronto area, where the provincial government gives religious schools – apart from Roman Catholic ones – no funding at all. As well, the Jewish community's financial support for Toronto-area day schools is not yet sufficient.

So, the Jewish population is of high average age and has relatively few children. As well, many mixed-faith offspring are not being raised as Jews, and although a few find their way into our ranks later, we are not winning this battle. Little is being done within the community to address these challenges in an effective and large-scale manner, despite the dire outlook for the future of Canadian Jewry. And perhaps not much can be done without finding new and very substantial resources to support Jewish matchmaking, young parents and education.

However, the successful program birthright israel, which takes Jewish young people on free trips to Israel, has shown that new approaches and programs can achieve a great deal when supported by a strong coalition of communal leaders. We need the vision and resolve to act together in order to meet our demographic challenges – once we recognize what is happening and stop the denial. This is not a situation that lends itself to a quick fix. It will be, rather, a multi-generational struggle for survival.

Some very good ideas have been proposed, including strong outreach to Jewish singles through the Internet (as reported last month in The CJN), but our UJA donations are still supporting business as usual, rather than innovative programs to cope with this crisis. Something significant needs to be done about the community's demographics, and soon.

Leo Davids is a professor emeritus of sociology at York University.

Opinions

On the threshold of a new year

As I write this column, it is still 2005. When you read it, it will be 2006. Although Jews may celebrate the new year in September and do not accept the Christological meaning of the date, we are still part of the secular world and this transition to a new date on the Gregorian calendar can be momentous and worthy of note.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Facing a new year requires some form of preparation and/or reflection. We humans habitually mark the significant transitions in our lives. We have very clear and important ceremonies to mark our life-cycle passages at birth, puberty, marriage and death. As studied by social scientists, we see that life-cycle rituals – or rites de passages – come in diverse forms and configurations, but are ever present. Being on the threshold of a new experience, a change in social status or membership, and facing the unknown, seems to necessitate some form of ritual or formal notation.

So marking the new year is an appropriate activity. But how do we note calendrical passages? Many people will have parties or watch a traditional program on TV. Surely that is the purpose of New Year's resolutions. Yet, it seems to me that we do not take these moments seriously. It is fitting that some people celebrate with parties and great joy in welcoming the new year. It signifies their optimism and hope for the new and the improved. We will do better!

But seriousness is also required. Just as we celebrate a wedding with great joy, and all the seven blessings recited emphasize the joy and gladness of the couple, so too we recognize the significance and even gravity of the marriage act. Two people are changing their lives forever and the wedding ceremony notes this transition with both cheerfulness and contemplation.

At Rosh Hashanah, Jews try to face the year ahead with that dual sense of joy and gravity. We are hopeful that the new year will be granted to us with health and happiness. We also take the time to look back at our performance, atone for mistakes and pledge improvement. Thresholds of all sorts involve this dual mode. Undeniably, they require reflection.

Accordingly, I am sitting here and wondering at the speed of time, the flow of the years and my own aging process. I am worried about my own mortality. (I have been to too many funerals lately.) But at the same time, I rejoice in this life and look to this new year for growth, accomplishments, friendship and love. Perhaps writing this column is part of my ritual process: taking the time to reflect on my life, on transitions in general, and on my hopes for the future.

Salvation and damnation at the movies

Maybe it's something in the water, or air pollution, but the recent search for theological authority in Hollywood movies has to be explained.

Folks, these are movies. They are made, for the most part, by people who do not believe in organized religion. Mel Gibson is an exception – I'll come back to him in a moment. I'm talking here about the endless media focus on whether a particular film gives a Christian – or demonic – message.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Take for example the Lion, Witch and Wardrobe. This children's story, which my daughter found too boring to read, is being held up as either a prime example of the Christianity of its author, C.S. Lewis, or a subtle attack on that same religion by its inclusion of all kinds of pagan creatures.

My take on the movie? It's loud, long and has lots of special effects. It also demonizes women – see the wicked white witch – or makes them subservient to the boys in the picture. Jesus as a lion? Give me a break. It's Satan who "goes about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour." Plus, Lewis clearly had some serious issues with women, but let's not go there.

Or take Harry Potter. Now there is a continuing story that I love. But the books and movies no more promote Satan worship, or witchcraft, than my Aunt Susie. So when the Christian right starts howling about how evil Harry Potter is, you have to wonder what they're smoking.

One final example: The early Star Wars films – the old ones with neat characters like Han Solo, Obi-Wan Kenobi, and Yoda – could be easily viewed as a subversive attempt at promoting Jewish values. How? Just look at the Force. It can be good, when wielded by Obi-Wan, or evil, when the dark side takes hold of Anakin Skywalker and turns him into Darth Vader. (Stop laughing, you in the back row.)

How is this Jewish? By having the yetzer hatov, the good inclination, face the yetzer hara, the evil inclination, that's how. Judaism teaches that these two forces exist within all of us, and we choose between them. So with a wave of my wand, I've turned some good rollicking cinema into a theology lesson.

I can only wonder how our society has come to such a point that it needs to look to movies to validate its salvation. What are people really looking for that they must seek it while inhaling popcorn?

With Mel Gibson, you have an answer. Gibson, who finds the current Catholic Church too liberal, has the means and motive to make a slasher flick starring Jesus as a way to trumpet his brand of Christianity, and he makes no apology for this. So you know what you are getting with him. I can hardly wait to see what he does with his latest project, a film about the Holocaust.

But how to explain the explosion of discussion around other cinematic theologies?

An answer came to me when I read about the Christian right's latest boycott of stores that were not sufficiently "Christmasy" and dared to wish people "Happy Holidays." Or when I read that anti-gay groups were targeting a local credit union, VanCity, because it pitched its ads to gay and lesbian groups. This is not about Jesus, or Christianity or devil worship or witchcraft or gays. It's about power.

The more North America becomes a multi-ethnic and multi-religion society, the more the old-timers feel threatened. The more we are different, the more the Christian right wants us to be the same. They will do anything, including making ludicrous claims about films and advertisements, to make those of us who stand a bit apart feel the weight of being non-Christian.

By exerting the power of boycott, intimidation and raucous slander, they appear to be the ones in charge – the real citizens of goodwill. That leaves the rest of us to either shout louder, by which we reveal our own, undeserving agendas, or keep our heads down until the storm passes.

This trend comes perilously close to revealing ugly prejudices. Finding no way to express themselves openly by saying "your religion, your immortal soul, is damned," the Christian right says it in other ways, indirectly, and with the full force of religion behind them.

Broadening horizons one paper clip at a time

We each live in multiple communities. Most readers of The CJN naturally belong to a Jewish community. At the same time, we're part of large urban or small rural communities, which, in turn, are part of the larger Canadian community. And, with the pervasive influence of the powerful North American media machine, we also are an integral part of our continental and global communities.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

With these highly integrated and overlapping communities, one would think that our fellow North Americans would share a certain core knowledge of history and have something in common with our view of the world.

This, of course, is not the case. Take, for example, Whitwell, Tenn., a small town with a population that is almost entirely white and Christian. It's a community where teaching the science of evolution in school might lead to a teacher's reprimand or outright dismissal. Tennessee was, of course, the site of the famous Scopes trial, which pitted believers in evolution against those who subscribed to creationism.

Like hundreds of similar communities throughout the American south, and indeed throughout much of the United States, Whitwell is a town whose citizens coalesce around the influence of football played by youngsters from almost every level of the school system.

Whitwell is also a place that has gained considerable attention as a result of courageous and visionary teachers and students at the Whitwell Middle School. Led by principal Linda Hooper and assistant principal David Smith, the school embarked on an ambitious and unprecedented project to teach the Holocaust to students in a community that had never heard of the Shoah and whose members had never even met a Jewish person. In fact, in a word-matching exercise at school, students related the term "Jew" to Jesus.

In order to promote an understanding of the enormity of the Holocaust, Hooper and Smith proposed the collection of six million paper clips – one for each Jew murdered in the Holocaust. The project grew beyond the school's expectations and amassed some 11 million paper clips, representing all the victims of the Nazis, Jews and others.

The project also attracted a great deal of attention, including from the motion picture industry. This led to the production of Paper Clips, a highly acclaimed 2004 documentary. The film received positive reviews, widespread accolades and many awards. It also led to a permanent exhibit in Whitwell, where the paper clips are displayed in a World War II German rail car that has become a striking part of the exhibit.

Paper Clips has been screened throughout North America, including in several Canadian cities. In fact, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival brought Smith, the assistant principal, to discuss the project and the film with members of the Toronto Jewish community.

There are many significant aspects to the paper clips project and movie. First, it's clear that there are many North American communities where people are not aware of the Holocaust and where its history is not taught in schools.

Secondly, the project reminds us that with the will and energy of administrators, teachers and students, the lessons of the Holocaust need not be lost to a large segment of the North American population.

Thirdly, while the Holocaust itself is stark evidence of the dark side of human nature, Paper Clips reminds us that there are positive and uplifting sides of the human experience. As Smith explained, there was significant parental and community support throughout the project.

Finally, and most importantly, the project shows how all communities are capable of embracing a forward-looking approach to issues of diversity, acceptance and, indeed, human rights.

There are other instances of communities working together to embrace the notion of acceptance and support for minorities. Paper Clips is the most recent example of the potential of all communities to confront historical reality and share in the life experiences of their continental and world neighbours.

The Kirshner File

Letter from France

The Théâtre Des Champs-Elysées in Paris glows in the dark, casting light on Avenue Montaigne, an elegant street whose sleek, upscale shops bear such eye-catching names as Dior, Prada, Valentino, Louis Vuitton and Harry Winston. The five-storey Canadian embassy building is close by, and the iconic Eiffel Tower glimmers enticingly in the distance.

Sheldon Kirshner in Paris

On this chilly night in the City of Lights, Parisians line up to watch a live performance of La Flute Enchantée (The Magic Flute), Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's passionate, playful opera. The thirtysomething performers, dressed in contemporary clothes, put on a rousing show. There is thunderous applause as they take their bows and the curtain falls.

Avenue Montaigne, a symbol of the bourgeois comforts and delights of a historic and cosmopolitan city, is far from the bleak cités, the low-income public housing projects in the troubled northern suburbs of Paris.

Late last autumn, in the worst civil unrest France has endured since the 1968 student revolts, the youthful inhabitants of depressed cités such as St. Denis, Clichy-sous-Bois and La Courneuve went on a violent three-week rampage, torching thousands of cars and burning hundreds of buildings. The riots – spearheaded by disaffected, alienated Arabs and Africans from mostly immigrant families – spread throughout France, greatly embarrassing the French government. Facing the spectre of a European intifadah, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin and his interior minister, Nicolas Sarkozy, clamped down, declaring a three-month state of emergency.

These events brought into sharp relief a whole host of simmering social problems that France may have underestimated or misunderstood. The have-not residents of cités are shackled by an unemployment rate that is twice the national average and are victimized by various forms of discrimination, said Marilou Jampolsky, the press secretary for SOS-Racisme, an organization dedicated to fighting racial prejudice and improving conditions for immigrants and their offspring.

It goes without saying that these embittered youths in the drab suburbs have not been properly integrated into French society. As a result, France, which regards itself as a secular bastion of human rights and a beacon of egalitarian ideals, all rooted in the 1789 revolution, has an immense problem on its hands.

France responded to the rioting by tougher policing and with belated promises to defuse the grievances in the cités, some of which have been breeding grounds for Islamic radicalism and anti-Semitism. But Jampolsky is skeptical that the government really means business, claiming it has not seriously addressed the grievances of the rioters. "It's blah blah blah," she said cynically.

Significantly, though, the riots did not affect France's Jewish community, the largest in Europe, with a history dating back to Roman times. True, two synagogues in the Paris suburbs of Pierrefitte and Garges-les-Gonesses were attacked, but the rioters do not appear to have known that they were shuls.

Until quite recently, French Jews were the objects of a flurry of anti-Semitic attacks, which broke out after the second Palestinian uprising began in September 2000. Synagogues, schools and institutions were subjected to random attacks, as were individuals, especially Orthodox Jews. Many of the perpetrators were identified as North African Arabs from the cités.

The Jewish intellectual Alain Finkielkraut drew flak by alluding to their religion and ethnicity. His comments caused outrage because religious affiliation is supposed to be a private matter in France. Having breached a sacrosanct republican convention, he apologized for having singled out Muslims, who comprise roughly 10 per cent of France's 60 million people.

Nonetheless, the consensus in the Jewish community is that Muslims, both Arabs and Africans, have been largely responsible for the recent wave of assaults, with neo-Nazis having played a secondary role. The conventional wisdom is that Muslims have lashed out against Jews to avenge the deaths of Palestinians in the intifadah and to register their disgust with their lowly status in France.

I discussed that sensitive and explosive issue with Haim Musicant, the director general of the Conseil Représentatif des Institutions Juives de France (CRIF), France's equivalent of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"I have a feeling that Muslims used the intifadah as a pretext to attack Jews," said Musicant, whose utilitarian office is just blocks away from the former offices of Le Monde, France's premier daily, as well as an unobtrusive bookshop specializing in Quebec literature. As far as he is concerned, Muslims have scapegoated Jews in retaliation for the discrimination they have encountered in French society when seeking jobs and housing.

Not surprisingly, Musicant is worried about the rising phenomenon of Islamic fundamentalism. "There are networks of radical Muslims in France," he said. "This is a problem not only for Jews but for the French Republic."

As worrisome as anti-Semitism has been lately, it pales into relative insignificance compared to the past century. The Dreyfus affair, which converted the assimilated Viennese journalist Theodor Herzl into a political Zionist, polarized France. It was the cause of the formal division of church and state in France in 1905, a defining moment in modern European history.

Like Germany, France has produced a steady stream of anti-Semitic agitators, from Charles Maurras and Maurice Barres to Edouard Drumont and Henri de Rochefort.

In 1936, when France's first Jewish prime minister, Leon Blum, introduced his government, a parliamentarian named Xavier Vallat, said, "To govern this peasant nation of France, it would be better to have someone whose origins, however modest, lie deep in our soil, rather than a subtle talmudist."

By no coincidence, Vallat became a top official in the pro-Nazi Vichy regime, which governed France from 1940 to 1944 and worked closely with Nazi Germany in the deportation of tens of thousands of Jews.

The Champs-Elysees in Paris

Despite these black clouds, there was a silver lining: France was the first European country to offer Jews full citizenship and emancipation.

Since the 19th century, France has produced a dazzling array of Jewish luminaries in a multiplicity of fields: Pierre Mendes-France and Simone Veil in politics; Henri Kagan and François Jacob in science; Henri Bergson and Jacques Derrida in the social sciences; Sarah Bernhardt and Claude Lelouch in theatre and film; Jacques Offenbach and Camille Pissarro in music and art; Marcel Proust and Romain Gary in literature; Jean-Jacques Servan-Schreiber and Anne Sinclair in journalism; Bernard-Henri Levy and Paul Celan in philosophy and poetry; and Andre Citroen and Edmond James de Rothchild in business. Last month, Alexandra Rosenfeld, 19, was crowned Miss France for 2006.

No one here is sure of the precise size of the community. "The last exact figure was arrived at in the early 1940s, when Jews had to register with the police," Musicant explained. Today, France is home to about 600,000 to 700,000 Jews. Half live in and around Paris and many of the rest in cities such as Marseilles, Lyons, Toulouse and Strasbourg.

Since 50 per cent of French Jews are of Middle Eastern, Spanish or Portuguese origin, France has the world's biggest agglomeration of Sephardi Jews after Israel.

When the yoke of the Nazi occupation was lifted in 1944, 180,000 Jews lived in France. From 1945 to 1948, more than 35,000 Jewish refugees, all European Holocaust survivors, poured into France. North African Jews from Morocco, Tunisia and Algeria streamed into France in the 1950s and 1960s, revitalizing the community. The Algerian Jews were French citizens, having acquired their nationality by virtue of the 1870 Cremieux decree. In the past decade, an additional 2,000 Moroccan Jews have joined them. "It took them about 20 years to find their footing," said Musicant of the North African Jews.

Jews from the former Soviet Union have not settled in France. "They were not of French culture," Musicant noted. "They felt the gates were open in Germany."

He claimed that the vast majority of Jews are confident they have a bright future in France, notwithstanding the anti-Jewish attacks since 2000 and the subtle anti-Semitism of right-wing politician Jean-Marie Le Pen.

Yet, a trickle of Jews are leaving France. On average, 2,000 have emigrated per year since 1995, most having made aliyah. But a growing number have immigrated to Quebec, according to Miguel Banet of Montreal's Jewish Immigrant Aid Society. JIAS processed 58 French arrivals in 2001 and 96 in 2002. In 2003 and 2004, the figures jumped to 206 and 430, respectively. Last year, JIAS handled 580 applicants from France.

These are not alarming statistics by any means, but they suggest that a small minority of Jews feel ill at ease in France.

Every Jew counts

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

The census taker was canvassing a neighbourhood. At one house, he was met by a chassidic mother of many children.

"How many children live here?" he asked.

"Well, there's Mendy, Chaim, Sara, and..."

"Never mind the names," he interrupted. "Just give me the number."

"They haven't got numbers mister," she insisted. "Every one of them has a name. Every one counts."

The story of Joseph and his brothers in this week's parshah has been widely popularized. After being betrayed by his brothers and sold into slavery, Joseph miraculously becomes the viceroy of Egypt. Jacob, his father, is under the impression that Joseph was dead and is initially doubtful about the turn of events. Only upon seeing the royal chariots that Joseph sends to him is Jacob convinced that his son is alive, and his spirit was revived.

What was it about these royal chariots that revived him? What convinced him they were Joseph's royal chariots and not a hoax? And even if Joseph was physically alive, what assurance did Jacob have that he was spiritually alive?

According to the medieval commentator Rashi, it was not the chariots themselves but rather a message encoded within them from Joseph that impressed Jacob.

You see, the last Torah lesson that Jacob taught Joseph just before his abduction was about finding the body of a murdered person whose killer is unknown and the associated ritual of "eglah arufah." (The Talmud says the patriarchs studied the Torah even before it was given to us.) The Hebrew word for chariot, "agalah," is almost identical to the word "egla." By sending his father chariots, he was reminding him of their mutual secret – the last piece of Torah they studied privately together. Only the real Joseph would have known this.

It was also a message about Joseph's spiritual wellbeing: After all these years, he was still thinking of the Torah that he and Jacob studied together before their tragic separation. Joseph may have become the viceroy of Egypt, but he was very much spiritually alive.

The secret message gets even deeper: The ancient murder mystery ritual, while being one of the most misunderstood rituals of Judaism, contains some of the most sensitive and moral teachings of the entire Bible. The ritual was to be performed by the elders of the city closest to the body found on the roadside. They were obliged to come out wash their hands and recite the words: "Our hands did not spill this blood."

Rashi asks the obvious question: "Is there even a remote possibility that the elders killed this poor soul found on the roadside?" Of course not. Yet the elders take responsibility for his death because perhaps they failed to offer him food or to escort him. This is the Jewish way: true Jewish leaders take responsibility for every Jew, even for the lost soul found dead on the roadside. Everyone counts.

This was Joseph's profound and comforting message, encoded in his royal chariots, that he sent to his aging father: "You can be very proud of me father. I have internalized our last Torah lesson. I have not become the self-centred Egyptian monarch you expected. Rather, I have grown into an altruistic Torah-Jew, basing my kingdom on the Jewish teachings I have studied with you. Like the elders of old, I have a sense of responsibility for the simple man on the street. My kingdom is predicated on the principle that 'everyone counts.'"

A Jew from Panama once wrote a letter to the Lubavitcher Rebbe and signed it as "A small Jew from Panama." The Rebbe promptly responded that there was no such thing as a small Jew. On another occasion, a philanthropist told the Rebbe about his outreach activities to Jews with no Jewish background. The Rebbe responded "No background? Every Jew is a child of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob!" The Rebbe's message, echoing our parshah, is clear: Every Jew – scholar or ignoramus, rich or poor, religious or not – counts!

It is written that the Mashiach will gather every single Jew from exile. At that time, we will appreciate the value of every Jew and understand that we are not mere numbers, like our enemies or statisticians would have us believe. Having a Godly soul within us, we are each an integral part of Am Yisrael. In the end of days, no Jew will be left behind, because every Jew counts.

Thinking outside the ortho-box

I'm now officially numb to Toronto's Orthodox community. It happened during a Shabbat meal a few weeks back when two friends of mine proudly denounced an enlightened and well-respected member of the Orthodox community – someone we all knew – as "non-religious."

Now, my buddies readily admitted that said individual kept strictly kosher and adhered to the laws of Shabbat, as set out in the Orthodox tradition. They were even pretty sure that he prayed three times a day. What possible reason, then, could they have to lash out in such a disgraceful manner?

"It's his ideas," explained one. "They're too modern."

What they meant is that this "non-religious" person looks at our tradition with a view that looks beyond the shtetl and the haredi yeshiva to see what Orthodox Judaism means today. And any lens that hints of the current, this reasoning goes, is too modern a lens.

It was a shocking outburst, one made all the more chilling by the realization that the diatribe was not an isolated attack: my friends didn't come up with the idea themselves – that kind of independent thought would have, in and of itself, been too modern.

For whatever reason, modern Orthdoxy – whatever that means – is no longer in vogue. There was a time not too long ago when the idea of a modernized Orthodox movement was something Jews could proudly – and publicly – strive for. But we seem to have lost the will to seek out the next act in our tradition. We're apparently satisfied with what we've got.

Borethodoxy. That's what I've been calling it lately.

That's why a new minyan in the city, for now generically (or, perhaps prophetically) nicknamed the "Toronto Minyan," is so refreshing. This fledgling shul, which has so far organized three Saturday morning services, dubs itself Orthodox egalitarian, incorporating, as the name suggests, participation from both men and women into the traditional Orthodox prayer service. And it's all done with encouragement from several Orthodox rabbis around the world (you can find a number of essays and detailed research on the topic on the Internet).

Men and women are granted equal opportunity to read from the Torah and be called up for an aliyah, to lead the congregation in the prayers of Psukei D'zimrah, as well as those before the scroll is taken from the Ark and when it is returned to it, and to recite a d'var Torah during the post-service kiddush.

More important than the almost-equal-opportunity agenda (there are still some things women can't do, such as lead the congregation for Shacharit and Mussaf) is the air of newness that has struck the participants – that fresh new minyan scent. Everybody is there because they want to be, a phenomenon that's foreign to any other service I've ever attended, and everyone seems to be having fun as well. Most, I think, realize that an "ortho-egal" alternative opens traditional Orthodoxy to a new generation that recognizes the value worldly ideas such as tolerance, equality and equal opportunity can contribute to Orthodox Judaism.

Others in our city have also taken up the cause to break new ground. Torah in Motion continues to run lectures, symposia and study programs that seek to understand how Judaism fits into everything else around it (and vice versa). And this past October, a Toronto-born graduate student at Boston University launched a new blog called "Divrei Torah Not For the Shabbos Table" (see shabbostable.blogspot.com) that questions traditional interpretations of the weekly Torah portion.

The Toronto Minyan is a step in the right direction, and a necessary one in a city that runs for cover under a mind-numbing security blanket of tradition each time someone has the guts to whisper the word "modern."

Renewing old-time volunteerism

By ROBYN TOUSSON

Guest Voice

When I first began working at Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee as the manager of volunteer programs a year and a half ago, my boss, Avrum Rosensweig, asked me how I was going to bring Judaism into the volunteer department. When I looked at him blankly, he sent me on an educational journey. He gave me names and phone numbers of community leaders, rabbis and others, and told me to ask as many questions as possible and seek different perspectives. I went on my way.

One of the things I learned was that in ancient Hebrew, there is no word to translate the English word "volunteer." Now, how can this be? Were the great sages that we so often speak of, Abraham, Miriam and Moses, our Jewish ancestors, not active citizens who fought for the betterment of humankind? Surely they must be the forefathers and foremothers of volunteerism. So why was there no biblical reference to volunteerism?

I met with a couple of people and was disappointed that no one could directly answer the question, "What does Judaism say about volunteerism?" I expected a myriad of references to Torah and Talmud, ancient lessons and anecdotes passed down from the generations before us. I knew so many Jews who made volunteerism a priority in their lives. So I kept wondering why no one could provide a direct answer to the question.

And then one day, I spoke to Rabbi Benjamin Hecht, the Toronto-based founder of Nishma, a Torah study and educational outreach institute (www.nishma.org). He explained that there was no such thing as volunteerism in the days of Torah. The Torah does not mention volunteerism. The reason for this, he said, was that volunteerism was everywhere. It was the foundation of life and was organically interwoven into the fabric of Jewish life. Ah ha! I thought.

Organic volunteerism is the kind that need not recruit, interview and train. It requires no evaluation or recognition, no hierarchy or institution. It need not be squeezed into an already over-scheduled life Nor is it the kind that functions to create purpose and meaning in a large and sometimes lonely world.

It is the kind of volunteerism that wakes up each morning and showers the ground with sprinkles of light as it moves through the day. It sends ripples into the waters and shoots rays to the heavens. It passes each person while caressing his or her back with a gentle hand. This is old-time volunteerism, ancient and sweet, common and easy, ingrained and internalized.

It is my hope that we will return to volunteerism like this and include it in everything that we do – work, play, relationships and community. I encourage you to think about what this would mean for us and what we would be required to do to change our lives and reacquaint ourselves with biblical "volunteerism," as well as how we could teach our kids this way of life.

And I encourage you to think about how today, and every day after today, we are going to slowly adapt our attitudes toward giving so that giving is more common, more instinctive and less calculating. More fluid and less scheduled, more organic and less institutionalized. Over the past couple of years, I've seen the change happening in my generation and others as well. It's exciting, and something to start feeding every chance we get.

Gefilte Fish on the web – Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It may not have the sweet aroma of freshly baked challah. Or the medicinal qualities of a bowl of piping hot chicken soup. But love it or not, gefilte fish has made quite a mark on Jewish culinary life. Today, gefilte fish on the web.

Miriam Silver sums up the gefilte fish dilemma perfectly in an article in the Santa Rosa Press Democrat. Although fish is symbolic of fertility and prosperity and has magical qualities in Jewish mysticism, "the ground-up, stuffed, over-cooked and cold gefilte fish has taken on a less glamorous sheen. It was a product, perhaps, of the shtetl culture – peasant Jews in the old country who probably used whatever fish was left over, ground it up and boiled it in a stock of old fish heads and bones. It was labour-intensive and did not always seem worth it. Fast forward to contemporary U.S.A. with its fast-food convenience culture and those oval, gray fish balls, mass-manufactured, tanked in a jar, swimming in jelly, along with a few old cooked carrots." But people are rediscovering those old recipes and inventing new ones. [http://tinyurl.com/7gtsd]

But why gefilte fish and why the Jews? In an excellent article in Jewish Heritage online magazine, Claudia Rosen examines the talmudic sources that brought fish to the Sabbath table and the cultural ones that made salt herring so popular on the other days of the week. "Gefilte fish evolved as a Sabbath dish because stuffing gives it glamour and because certain versions eliminate the need to remove bones [which could be considered a forbidden activity on the Sabbath]." [http://www.jhom.com/topics/fish/gefilte.html]

Wikipedia, the free online dictionary, points out that the ground-up fish paste would be stuffed ("gefilte") into a whole fish. But "somewhat ironically," in much modern preparation, including commercial preparation, the whole fish-stuffing step is omitted. [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ge filte_fish]

Gefilte fish may not be the number 1 Jewish food to come to mind. But Matthew Goodman writes in a wonderful article in Forward that in the 1920s, French food writer Edouard de Pomiane observed of jellied carp, "This is the classic carp dish as it appears on all the Sabbath luncheon tables. If one had to sum up all of Jewish cooking in a single dish, this is the one that would epitomize it." Goodman says carp was so popular that it was offered in four variations in the encyclopedia of French haute cuisine, Larousse Gastronomique. [http://tinyurl.com/8uoal]

One of the most heated debates on Jewish food is over how to prepare gefilte fish: sweet or peppery. But according to Michael Steinlauf who teaches Jewish studies at Gratz College in Philadelphia, how you fancy your fish can tell a lot about your heritage. "The 'gefilte fish line' ran though eastern Poland. Jews living to the west – most of Poland, as well as Germany and the rest of Western Europe – ate the sweet gefilte fish. Those to the east – Lithuania, Latvia and Russia – ate the peppery treat." [http://tinyurl.com/9x9vc]

That gefilte fish line is nothing new to Allan Evans. I chanced upon an e-mail he sent to a kosher food message board looking for advice on finding take-out gefilte fish without sugar in New York City. "Having been raised on the subtle, tart Litvak style of preparing this dish, the sweetening of this delicacy is an abomination to the palate." [http://tinyurl.com/7p8to]

Evans would be advised to stay away from the next recipe. "My Mother-in-law's Sweet Style Gefilte Fish" calls for $^2/_3$ cup sugar, $^1/_2$ lb. of ground whitefish, $^1/_2$ lb. of ground pike, 1 lb. of ground dore, and yet another $^1/_3$ cup sugar for the broth. [http://tinyurl.com/azry5]

Sweet or peppery, it can be tough trying to live up to a family tradition. In Adventures in Bubby Irma's Kitchen, we get a recipe and a story: "Making gefilte fish is a challenge. My mother made it – my grandmother made it – and I had to make it… But, like every child, I needed my parents' approval. At that time we were living in Worcester, Mass., and my parents lived in Camden, N.J. I carefully wrapped a jar of the freshly made delicacy and sent it out Air Mail, Special Delivery. A few days later. I received a call from Mom and Dad telling me how great the fish was. I was thrilled. Years later, they finally told me the truth… it arrived spoiled but they didn't want to hurt my feelings. I made another batch while they were visiting and got their full approval." [http://tinyurl.com/djm9u]

Next week, more gefilte fish recipes – and how to give jarred gefilte fish a heimishe taste.

UJA FEDERATION

UJA campaign closes with $58-million tally

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto celebrated the success of its 2006 campaign late last month, as approximately 200 supporters braved a winter storm to get to the York Event Theatre for the closing event.

The campaign is expected to raise a final total of $58 million, surpassing last year's tally by $3 million, the federation said.

Toronto's UJA campaign is the third largest in North America, behind only New York and Chicago.

Funds raised will be used for educational and social welfare programs in Toronto and Israel. Among the local agencies and facilities supported by UJA Federation are Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), the downtown Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and a Jewish education network that serves 17,000 students.

The campaign closing featured a keynote address by journalist David Frum, a former speechwriter for U.S. President George W. Bush and the brother of Linda Frum-Sokolowski, chair of this year's women's campaign and advocacy.

Before his address, which featured his insights on the Bush presidency and the ways Jews can advocate for themselves in world politics, Frum congratulated his sister and the entire leadership and volunteer base of federation for their efforts on the campaign.

The 2006 campaign chairs were Warren Kimel and Honey Sherman.

"Knowing that our campaign is altering the course of Jewish lives everywhere and contributing toward a world of good gives me a tremendous sense of fulfilment," Kimel said.

Kimel and Sherman both praised the rest of the campaign leadership team, including vice-chair Brad Fox and Frum-Sokolowski.

To conclude the evening, federation chair David Engel thanked Kimel and Sherman and introduced Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks as the 2007 campaign chairs, with Judith Finer-Freedman as chair of the women's campaign and advocacy.

Associated principal has 32 years experience

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sheldon Diamond, the new general studies principal at Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack middle school, sees a commonality between the different streams of Judaism.

"Torah values permeate the basis of Judaism. We may conduct our services differently, but what motivates us is our connection to the Torah," says Diamond, a member of Temple Har Zion, a Reform congregation.

Sheldon Diamond

He also sees similarities between the public school system – he was a public school educator for 32 years, half of which he spent as an administrator – and the Hebrew day school system.

"Teachers are teachers, students are students, and parents are parents. There are different faces, but our common goal is to turn out well-adjusted children."

Where Hebrew and public schools differ is in the Judaic studies component. "That gives us a clear definition of our mission. [In public school], the mission is more diverse, because they deal with a more diverse population," Diamond says.

"Ours is more clear in direction. We impart Torah values, but as far as human behaviour is concerned, our mission is the same," he adds, noting that Associated maintains an "Orthodox leaning."

Diamond, 58, says he took his position at Associated this past August because "the opportunity came up and I was ready for a professional change in order to continue my growth as an educator."

He does miss being a teacher, he says, particularly when he watches other teachers. "I had fun in the classroom. Administration does not allow for much creativity. There is a certain joy in watching children learn.

"I do try to get involved with everyone, though. Being visible and accessible is critically important. I'm there to help the staff with curriculum development, behaviour issues, and overall concerns.

"I also assist with counselling, and in applying fair and appropriate discipline. The ramifications are wide and far-reaching. It's the way we all work together to be respectful of the learning environment."

Diamond, whose own two children are 21 and 15, says adolescence is a difficult time.

"These children are all under construction. They're in the transformation zone between children and adults. They have a lot of stuff going on that makes them unique, and they do things to test our patience," he says.

"You have to keep things in perspective. We need to support them, listen to them and understand them, but we shouldn't give entitlement without responsibility. They can't have it one way."

The pace of the current educational system is something Diamond has had to get used to.

"At the beginning of my [teaching] career, we used 10-year-old textbooks. Our resources were limited," he says.

"Things have changed dramatically. With the Internet, there is now a rapid exchange of information. Teachers have to be well-versed in computer technology.

"Students are able to watch world events unfolding, and this fuels their sense of social responsibility. Our students rallied to help out people in New Orleans [after Hurricane Katrina]. Part of Torah values is to help out within and beyond our own community."

Shul-hopping pair helps promote Jewish unity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Barbara Borenstein and Howard Jerome are planning an event that they say will be "BYOSS" – Bring your own shul story – but it's unlikely anyone will have more stories than they do.

The longtime friends – and, more recently, "shul buddies" – have attended Shabbat services at more than 30 Toronto-area synagogues in the past year, representing about a quarter of the city's congregations.

What began as Jerome's idea to visit and experience different synagogues soon turned into a full-fledged project.

Their first function will be a get-together they are planning for mid-January. Details were still being finalized at press time.

"My hope is to inspire people to do one of two things. If they're already affiliated, [I'd like them to] check out another synagogue," Jerome said. "And part two is the outreach to those who are unaffiliated, to check it out.

On a broader scale, they would like to foster greater Jewish unity in a diverse community.

Barbara Borenstein and Howard Jerome have been to Shabbat services at more than 30 Toronto shuls in the past year. [Frances Kraft photo]

They would like to match unaffiliated people with synagogues that they can try, as well as organize group synagogue visits if there is interest.

"We're looking to reignite people's passion for shul. It certainly happened for me," said Jerome, who was born Howard Jerome Gomberg in Brooklyn 66 years ago. "I left the faith for 40 years."

The stage, film and television actor has been based in Toronto since 1980. He become an atheist many years ago – after his bar mitzvah – and went on to explore Buddhism, Aboriginal spirituality, Hindu Yoga and Kabbalah.

After attending the Kabbalah Centre for a dozen years, he realized he "had no idea what [other Jews] were doing."

Borenstein, 49, who sells advertising for the Jewish Yellow Pages, was raised in an Israeli-Canadian Conservative Jewish home in Toronto.

During a five-year stint in Vancouver, she was affiliated with Or Shalom, a Jewish Renewal congregation. Since her return here in 1997, she has split her synagogue time between Beth Tzedec Congregation, which she attended as a child, and Aish HaTorah's Village Shul.

After about half a dozen of their synagogue visits, Borenstein and Jerome realized that others were interested in what they were doing.

"People started to ask, 'What are the prayers like?' 'Is it friendly?' 'What is the food [for kiddush] like?' 'How many women were there?'" Borenstein said.

They addressed those questions in an article that appeared in the Jewish Yellow Pages after they had visited 18 congregations.

The article painted a very positive picture of the synagogues they visited, and the duo are still enthused about their experiences.

"Tell her about the father and son," Jerome says to Borenstein during their joint interview with The CJN.

He was referring to Beth Torah Congregation's Cantor David Young and his son Jakie, the synagogue's "junior chazzan," who recorded his first CD at age 10.

"The way they harmonized with each other – it sent goose pimples up and down my arms," Borenstein said.

"There were so many beautiful moments," she added. "People who don't go [to services] don't get what they're missing."

Other memorable impressions included the "exotic and melodic" sounds of Sephardi prayers, Jerome said.

It's impossible to compare shuls, he said, adding that they can be as different from each other as "lox and watermelon."

Borenstein and Jerome said they were welcomed everywhere they went. However, she noted, "we do something that other people may not do. We talk to people."

And people respond in kind, she noted.

Once they do, the visitors explain that they are visiting for the first time and want to "experience" the synagogue. They also ask congregants why they go to shul, and what they love about their congregations.

She and Jerome have become "walking shul directories," he said.

Borenstein said her experience attending synagogue has made her value Shabbat as "a gift in a speedy, high-tech world."

For further information on the upcoming event, e-mail clubshul@rogers.com or call 416-271-8107.

Struggling to understand Ahmadinejad's ravings

Yet another anti-Semitic outburst by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad – this time denying the Holocaust and suggesting Israel relocate to Europe or North America – prompted an outpouring of media reports and analysis last month. He had previously called for Israel to be "wiped off the map."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In "UN condemns Tehran on rights" (Toronto Star, Dec. 17), Olivia Ward noted that at a European Union summit in Brussels, Canada, along with Germany and other European countries, condemned Ahmadinejad's outrageous anti-Semitic statements. The summit "also voiced 'grave concerns' about Iran's nuclear program, which critics fear could lead to the production of an atomic bomb." At the same time, at the United Nations General Assembly, a Canadian-backed resolution censuring Tehran for its human rights violations was adopted by a vote of 75-50, with 43 abstentions.

In "The agenda behind the racist rant" (Star, Dec. 17), Mitch Potter interviewed analyst Meir Javedanfar, an Iranian Jew who recently immigrated to Israel.

Javedanfar cited three motives behind Ahmadenijad's rhetoric. The first is about "shoring up his very weak position inside Iran… These outbursts forced Iran's supreme religious leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei to back him," Javedanfar argued.

"Second, all these statements – particularly what he said about blaming Europe for the creation of Israel – is about finding a scapegoat for the fact that the [European-led] negotiations over Iran's nuclear aspirations appear to be headed for a breakdown…

"And third, Ahmadinejad is showing he likes to play to an audience… The first outburst was in a speech to the Third World, the second was at an Islamic conference in Saudi Arabia. And the third, where he called the Holocaust a myth, came as Iran was hosting a special guest – the leader of Hamas, Khaled Meshaal."

In a Nov. 3 article in the New York Review of Books titled "Soldiers of the Hidden Imam," Timothy Garton Ash (recently described as "the master craftsman" of analytical reportage by historian Norman Davies) wrote that for all its purported complexity, the Iranian regime "remains quite simple. At its core, the Islamic Republic is still an ideological dictatorship." And there are no signs of the regime weakening. Indeed, windfall profits from oil and gas exports only embolden its extremist program.

Javendanfar told the Toronto Star that any regime change will likely come from Iranian businessmen "who operate multi-billion-dollar conglomerates that thrive on dealing with the outside world," and do not want to risk losing business because of Iran's growing radicalism.

But Garton Ash paints a different picture: "Westernized business leaders are witheringly critical of the regime in private, but dependent on it for their business. Some have formed commercial partnerships with leading mullahs."

Garton Ash pins his hopes on Iran's younger generation: "The regime has spent 25 years trying to make these young Iranians deeply pro-Islamic, anti-American, anti-Western, and anti-Israeli. As a result, most of them are resentful of Islam (at least in its current, state-imposed form), rather pro-American, and have a curiosity about Israel."

While Javedanfar agreed that the "great majority of [Iranians] are tolerant, open-minded people" who do not "hate Israel with the same passion demonstrated by their president," he also "assesses as 'absolute zero' the possibility Iranians will rise up and overthrow the conservative ideologues who hold power."

Indeed, several other Israeli experts warn that Iran's restive young population poses no cohesive threat to the ruling mullahs in the foreseeable future. Meanwhile, nuclear weapons in the hands of these ideological extremists pose an imminent danger to Israel and the rest of the world. It's a looming problem that urgently requires an answer.

New faces take over at CJC, Pacific region

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Pacific region of Canadian Jewish Congress has hired two new staff members to run the organization's activities in British Columbia, Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

The new hires, who will work out of CJC's Vancouver offices, are acting regional director Mira Oreck and education director Jeff Bradshaw.

They succeed Erwin Nest, who stepped down earlier this year after more than two decades as executive director of Congress' Pacific region, and Romy Ritter, the community relations director for the past five years who also stepped down recently.

CJC chief executive officer Bernie Farber said the Pacific region is large and complex.

"The Pacific region is huge geographically, with a lot going on," Farber said. "We need the best people in place to do the day-to-day work as well as the thinking going forward to accomplish our organization's strategic goals."

Oreck is responsible for the administration of the CJC office, as well as operations, policy issues and outreach to the Jewish and non-Jewish communities.

She said CJC's three-year regional "action agenda" will focus on hate and bias crime, hate propaganda, Holocaust education, human rights protection, multiculturalism and affordable housing.

"With the help of a dynamic new staff, we're turning a fresh page in the Pacific region office," Oreck said. "We look forward to working with fellow agencies and acting on their behalf."

Oreck said she is "happy and excited" to be part of CJC.

"I believe strongly in Canadian Jewish Congress and its work," she said. "I'm looking forward to giving voice to such important issues as social justice, housing and poverty and to building allies on important issues, including relationships outside the Jewish community."

Oreck, a native of Vancouver, has been on CJC's Pacific region board for a year-and-a-half.

A graduate of McGill University in sociology and women's studies and Simon Fraser University in sustainable community development, Oreck has been active in Canadian politics and in the environmental movement.

Education director Jeff Bradshaw will develop curriculum that addresses anti-Semitism and racism. In addition, he will be CJC's multiculturalism advocate and security contact.

Current projects Bradshaw is working on include an Aboriginal-Jewish dialogue, a Charter of Rights and Freedoms values project, an anti-racism program for high school students in the Comox Valley on Vancouver Island, and an anti-racism curriculum for Pearson College, a residential high school just outside Victoria.

"I'm passionate about CJC and my role as education director," Bradshaw said. "CJC is the most influential Jewish organization in Canada. I'm looking forward to helping to re-invigorate the Pacific region's stance on many issues."

A native of Toronto, Bradshaw studied theatre at Algonquin College in Ottawa and political science at Simon Fraser University.

Farber said there will be a greater emphasis at CJC on working closely with the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

"It's really nothing new," Farber said. "It's just a slight change in emphasis, because it's essential for Congress and federation to work well together."

Quebec Jews will stick with the Liberals

By DAVID LAZARUS

Election 2006 Analysis

How most Canadian Jews will vote on Jan. 23 will be determined by any number of timely and important issues, including the sponsorship scandal, health care, child care, the economy, each party's support for Israel, and the environment.

The Toronto area has several ridings with significant Jewish populations that could go either Liberal or Conservative, and the outcome might actually be decided by the "Jewish vote." And results in certain key swing ridings could, in fact, determine which party forms the next government, which most pundits predict will again be a minority one.

But that's not the way it works for Jews in Quebec.

Save for a very small number who will vote Conservative, NDP or for a fringe party, the overwhelming majority of Quebec Jews – who live mostly in the western parts of the Island of Montreal – will vote Liberal, just like their neighbours.

That's because they will not base their vote, as Jews outside Quebec surely do, on policies, programs or the ignominy of past scandal. They will vote Liberal either because they support the party or because there is no other party, from their point of view, to vote for.

The Bloc Québécois? Not an option. The Tories? The party has maybe a tiny amount of Jewish support, but certainly not enough to make a difference in the solidly Liberal ridings where Jews live. The NDP? It may have a few Jewish supporters, but David Lewis is long dead, and so are most of the Jews who voted for him.

The Bloc threatens to come away with maybe 60 (or more) of Quebec's 75 seats, because of pure laine Quebecer anger over the sponsorship scandal combined with the sentiment that the Bloc best represents francophone Quebec's interests in Ottawa.

How do Quebec Jews feel? They may not be thrilled with the Liberals over the sponsorship scandal, but who else is there to vote for? The last time Quebec Jews voted for a Tory in any real numbers was when they voted for a fellow Jew, Gerry Weiner, the Progressive Conservative candidate in the West Island riding of Pierrefonds-Dollard. He ended up being elected twice and served as the federal multiculturalism minister.

That was back in 1988, when the Tories were still a force to be reckoned with in Quebec under then-prime minister Brian Mulroney. Mulroney's Tories fared very well in Quebec when they won back-to-back majorities in 1984 and 1988 with a now impossible-to-imagine 58 and 54 seats, respectively, in the province.

After the Meech Lake and Charlottetown constitutional debacles, however, it was all over for the Tories in Quebec – the last Tory MP in Quebec was elected in 1997 – and onward and upward for the Bloc (54 Bloc MPs were elected last year).

Even though he was from full-blooded anglophone Irish stock, Mulroney did extraordinarily well in Quebec because he was (at one time, anyway) charming and charismatic, and because he grew up in the province speaking perfect joual just like francophone Quebecers. He was also willing to address the issue of Quebec's constitutional place in Canada, and Quebecers have a fondness for voting for compatriots.

Current Conservative leader Stephen Harper, by contrast, is none of the above: he is neither a Quebecer nor a francophone, and he also lacks charm and a Mulroney-like inclination to address Quebec's constitutional grievances.

A widely held perception here is that if the Conservatives form the next government – even a minority one – under the leadership of a non-francophone, non-Quebecer who is not particularly sympathetic to Quebec's aspirations, it will only help nurture the sovereigntist cause.

Among Quebec's Jews, the Conservative party doesn't stand a chance, even if it runs a slew of Jewish candidates all over Montreal's west end. (It's not, save for proverbial Tory candidate Neil Drabkin, who is running in the largely Jewish riding of Mount Royal. Since 1993, he has run in every federal campaign, except for the last one in 2004.)

Even if the party did run a slate of Jewish candidates, besides potentially being seen as a transparently cynical move to woo Jewish votes, it wouldn't work, because Montreal Jews don't tend to "think" conservatively, unlike some Jews in other parts of Canada, such as Toronto.

Montreal Jews, apart for their anomalous support for Weiner, have never really, at least in modern times, backed a Jewish Tory candidate, perhaps because the Jewish sensibility on social issues has traditionally been closer to Liberal policy on that score.

The bottom line, then, is that the ridings where most of Montreal's Jews live – Mount Royal, Westmount–Ville-Marie, and Notre-Dame-de-Grace–Lachine – are more solidly Liberal than Alan Alda. The Jews there almost all vote Liberal, and that's all there is to it.

In Mount Royal, the riding once represented by former prime minister Pierre Trudeau, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler will once again win by one of the largest margins in the country. So Tory-averse is the riding, in fact, that a Conservative candidate, Drabkin, finished behind the Bloc there in 1993 (and the Bloc candidate trailed winner Sheila Finestone, a Liberal – what else – by more than 36,000 votes).

It will be much iffier for the Liberals in several other Montreal-area ridings, where they'll be fighting it out with the Bloc.

So there it is: when Jan. 23 rolls around, Quebec Jews will vote Liberal and the Bloc could win up to three-quarters of the province's seats.

No surprises there.

New leaders in the West

JNF president has Canadian military background

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Graham Dixon, the new president of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) for Manitoba and Saskatchewan, has an impressive resume.

It includes service in the Canadian military, experience in the banking industry and positions at the highest levels of government.

Dixon was officially installed at the JNF's annual meeting held on Dec. 15 at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue.

Originally from Montreal, Dixon enlisted in the Canadian Armed Forces in his teens and saw action in the Korean War. After leaving the army, he spent 25 years working for the federal government, mainly in the Department of Manpower and Immigration. He ended his government career as senior policy adviser to the minister of Manpower and Immigration and Transport Canada.

Following his government service, he worked for 10 years as regional director (Manitoba and Saskatchewan) of the Canadian Bankers Association.

Dixon, who has lived in Winnipeg for the past 30 years, has been involved in virtually every economic initiative that has been undertaken in Manitoba. He played a role in the Core Area Initiative in the early 1980s, the Churchill Task Force in '95 and the Mid Continental International Trade Corridor Task Force ('99), as well as in the Pan Am Games.

He is an active member of the Association of Jewish War Veterans of Canada (General Moshe Dayan Post), the Foundation Vanier and the Eric and the Jack Wells Memorial Foundation, and is a board member of the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra. His previous volunteer positions include membership on the boards of the Shaarey Zedek and Rosh Pina synagogues, the Riverview Health Centre, the Youth Employment Service, the Winnipeg and Manitoba Chambers of Commerce and the Winnipeg Downtown Business Improvement Zone. He was also treasurer of the Federal Advisory Council for Judicial Appointments.

Dixon has worked closely with JNF shaliach for the Prairie provinces Rami Kleinmann.

"Rami understands that we can't just focus on the Jewish community for support," Dixon says.

"We have to reach out to the general public – and not just for financial support. Rami has gone far beyond the traditional responsibilities of a JNF shaliach."

Dixon noted that Kleinmann has been instrumental in forging agreements between the JNF and the governments of Israel and Alberta and Manitoba involving sharing technology related to water resources. He also cited a new JNF project with the national leadership of the Assembly of First Nations.

At the meeting, Kleinmann spoke of the importance of emphasizing Israel's positive accomplishments. "The State of Israel has accomplished incredible things," he said. "That's what we should be trying to get across.

"The JNF is looking for partnerships, not handouts. We are here to do business. We have over 100 years of expertise that can be helpful to Canada and First Nations People."

Dixon praised the efforts of his predecessors, Len Podheiser and Tom Gillman. Joe Rabinovitch, executive vice-president of JNF Canada, also praised Podheiser for his efforts as JNF president over the past three years.

Physician becomes president of Winnipeg Jewish Federation

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ted Lyons, a physician, is the new president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

One of his main goals over the next two years is to try to promote a greater understanding of the work of the federation in the community.

"Before I joined the federation board two years ago, I knew very little about the federation," Lyons says.

"Since then, I have learned what the federation's work means to the Jewish community locally, nationally and internationally. The more I learned, the more I wanted to be involved.

"I feel that people across the country aren't really aware of all the work that federation does. So much of it is behind the scenes. If people understand the workings of federation better, they would have a greater appreciation of the challenges our communities are facing."

Lyons, 62, is a professor and former head of the department of radiology, a professor of obstetrics and gynecology and associate professor of anatomy at the University of Manitoba and its Health Sciences Centre. He is also the son of a physician. His father, the late Ruvin Lyons, was a popular obstetrician who was involved in leadership roles in the Jewish community.

"I was exposed to community involvement at an early age," Ted Lyons says. "My father was my role model."

Ruvin Lyons served as president of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue – Winnipeg's largest congregation – in 1969-70. His son, Ted, served in the same capacity in from 1999 to 2001, after serving on the board for several years.

Ted Lyons was recruited to join the federation board in 2000 by Neil Duboff. Duboff is Lyon's immediate predecessor as federation president, and was also a member of Shaarey Zedek's board. Lyons joined the federation's executive committee in 2001.

Lyons says that as federation president he intends to follow up on Duboff's efforts to strengthen ties with the federation's beneficiary agencies. He also wants to improve communication between the federation board and the synagogues.

Commenting on the community's challenges, Lyons cited the issues of poverty and an aging population, as well as the need for more foster homes and the need to encourage more people to volunteer their time on behalf of the community.

Winnipeg's Jewish community has grown by about 1,500 in the past five years after decades of decline and the annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign continues to grow each year.

This year's CJA target was $4.65 million – $150,000 more than the record amount of $4.5 million raised last year – but the '05-06 goal had already been reached and surpassed by the end of December. By that time, the 2005-06 campaign had raised $4.768 million, with four months still to go.

Charges against Netanyahu protester dropped

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Remaining charges against Jaggi Singh in connection with the 2002 violent protest against the appearance of former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu at Concordia University have been dismissed.

The charges included assault, illegal assembly and breaches of conditions of release. The Crown has 30 days to appeal.

Montreal Municipal Court judge Pierre Fontaine ruled in favour of Singh's motion of abuse of process by the Crown in which Singh alleged that Concordia failed to disclose more than 30 videos taken by surveillance cameras at the university on the day of the protest, Sept. 9, 2002.

Netanyahu was prevented from speaking that day by a violent protest outside the downtown building where he was scheduled to appear.

Singh, who represented himself, said the videos show inconsistencies with the testimony against him by Concordia security guards, including then head of security, Jean Brisebois. These include an allegation that Singh pushed a security guard.

"With surveillance cameras everywhere, the unedited videos show clearly that I committed no criminal acts, as well as showing a portrait of the Netanyahu protest much more favourable to the demonstrators," Singh said.

In April and May, 2004, Singh was acquitted of charges of conspiracy, obstruction and other breaches of conditions due to lack of evidence. The Crown's motion to appeal was rejected at that time.

Singh's was the only criminal trial that has taken place in connection with the Netanyahu protest.

"It's a total victory," Singh claimed. "It's also a complete embarrassment for Concordia and the Crown."

Concordia has declined to comment directly, with its spokesperson Chris Mota saying only that the charges were laid by the Crown and not the university.

Singh, 34, was charged in January 2003, shortly after being deported from Israel, where he was advocating for Palestinians through the International Solidarity Movement. Singh then spoke at Concordia in support of students who had been sanctioned for their involvement in the Netanyahu protest by an internal tribunal.

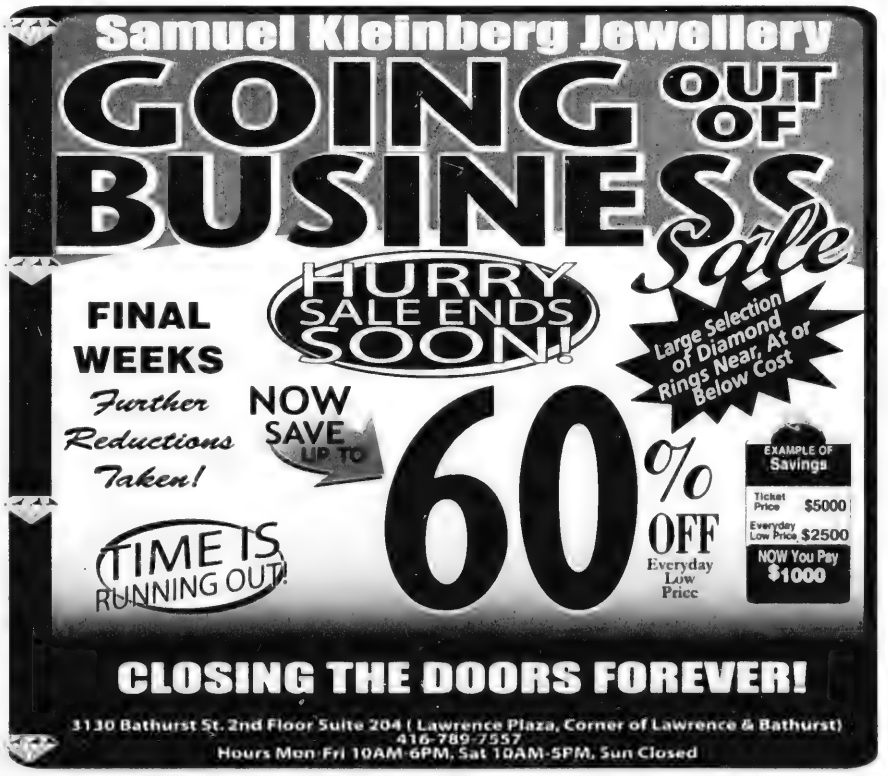
The university administration banned Singh from the campus for five years.

Singh has never been a Concordia student. He said he has done, and continues to do, research on a project connected with the university.

Singh said he helped write the so-called "arrest warrant" against Netanyahu that detailed the former prime minister's alleged war crimes and was distributed by students who wanted to block his speaking engagement on campus.

He also wrote an article that was published in the Globe and Mail a few days after the protest that defended the opposition to Netanyahu and provided his account of what happened to spark the violence.

Singh has been a highly visible left-wing activist for the past decade, particularly in the anti-globalization movement. He first came to wide public attention during the 1997 Asia Pacific Economic Co-operation conference in Vancouver, when the RCMP arrested him on the campus of the University of British Columbia. Charges were later dropped.



Israel boycott likely to have little impact, CIC says

Also present was Ronald Cameron, president of the Fédération des Enseignantes et Enseignants du Collegial du Québec. Cameron led a delegation of 20 CEGEP teachers who, in October 2004, attended a conference in Ramallah opposing the security fence.

Two of the endorsing organizations, Entraide missionaire and SUCO, are well-established, international co-operation groups.

Most of the other groups are associated with the Arab or Muslim communities or left-wing causes. The Jewish Alliance Against the Occupation and PAJU (Palestinians and Jews United) have also signed on.

The FFQ was founded in 1965 by the late senator Thérèse Casgrain, a pioneer in women's rights in Canada, who helped secure the vote for women in Quebec in 1940. Sheila Finestone, later a member of Parliament and senator, was the FFQ's first anglophone president from 1977 to 1980.

Today, the FFQ lists 152 women's groups from across the province as associate organizations.

The boycott is initially targeting Israeli wines sold at Société des Alcools du Québec outlets – it has identified 19 of them – as well as Caterpillar, which makes heavy machinery and other products such as boots, caps, toys and pocket-knives. The organizations allege that Caterpillar has been providing the Israeli army with bulldozers for many years.

The campaign also urges divestment in Israel or in companies trading with it, and sanctions, such as ending the free-trade agreement between Canada and Israel.

The boycott organizers are distributing a flyer that cites an appeal last July to the international community from more than 170 Palestinian "civil society organizations" to initiate a boycott against Israel similar to that intended to pressure apartheid South Africa. The flyer quotes Desmond Tutu as saying in 2002: "I've been very deeply distressed in my visit to the Holy Land; it reminded me so much of what happened to us black people in South Africa."

The coalition is inviting individuals, governments, corporations and other non-governmental organizations to join the protest. It is urging all unions get rid of any investments in their pension funds that "contribute – even indirectly – to the prolongation of the Israeli occupation."

Permanent members of the coalition include the province's major labour federations: the Centrale des Syndicats du Québec (CSQ), the Confédération des Syndicats Nationaux, and the Montreal regional council of the Fédération des Travailleurs et Travailleuses du Québec.

In 2002, Jewish community leaders denounced in the strongest terms the CSQ when its president, Monique Richard, along with the coalition, called for a boycott of Israeli products and compared the state to apartheid South Africa because of its treatment of the Palestinians. At the time, the CSQ had 145,000 members, the majority of them working in the education sector and the public service.

Leaders of FEDERATION CJA, the Canada-Israel Committee, Canadian Jewish Congress and the Communauté Séphardade du Québec recently held a joint press conference where they blasted the move as "a call for abject intolerance, blatant revisionism and terrible injustice."

Israel Consul General Marc Attali deplored the boycott call, but also doubts it will have much impact.

"Boycotts and divestments are a shameful attempt to demonize and delegitimize Israel and are insulting to an intelligent person. They have been a total failure elsewhere.

"Israel has a great deal to be proud of in its defence of democratic values and human rights, including respect for minorities, in spite of being engaged in a war against terrorism."

Saber-Freedman added: "The unions have a lot on their plate right now. I don't think this will be high on their list of priorities."

CHANUKAH LIGHTS: The embassy of Israel, in conjunction with the Jewish community of Ottawa, last week held a Chanukah party and candle lighting ceremony at the Machzikei Hadas synagogue. Various ambassadors, including the Apostolic Nuncio of the Vatican, former deputy prime minister Herb Grey, rabbis, diplomats and the general public attended the party. Seen here is Alan Baker, ambassador of Israel and Rabbi Reuven Bulka lighting the menorah.

Correction

In the article "Conservative rabbi's comment sparks outrage" (CJN, Dec. 22), the Shefa Network was incorrectly described as a group of left-leaning Conservative rabbis. In fact, the activist group includes rabbis, educators and lay leaders. The CJN regrets the error.

Anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism rampant, campus activists say

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Incidents of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism on Ontario university campuses are not isolated, but are part of a growing disease, said the director of campus affairs for the right-wing Zionist student movement Betar-Tagar.

Students from the organization spoke at Adas Israel Synagogue in Hamilton last month and shared some of their experiences on campus over the past few years.

Seniors, young families and students were among those attending the event, as were Ancaster-Dundas-Flamborough-Westdale Liberal MP Russ Powers and Burlington Tory MPP Cam Jackson.

Jackson told the audience that anti-Semitism is an "important issue that affects the fabric of our nation," adding that "any hate crime against any Canadian citizen is a crime against all Canadians."

Speakers from the student club Zionists at McMaster shared their frustration over anti-Israel literature on campus. The group was formed three years ago in response to anti-Zionist activity on campus by the group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights.

As well, Betar-Tagar's director of campus affairs, Jonathan Jaffit, showed photos from Israel Apartheid Week at the University of Toronto earlier this year.

Signs displayed on campus at the time included, "Globalize the Intifada," "JNF out of Canada" and "Zionism=Racism."

Flyers displayed and distributed included the logo of the Fatah-affiliated Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade militia, which has been named by the Canadian government as a terrorist organization.

Independent documentary filmmaker Igal Hecht presented a documentary about anti-Israel vitriol at York University. The film, Protest, which aired on Vision TV in 2003, showed confrontations between Arab and Jewish students that went from verbal to physical.

In the film, one student warns that Jewish students should be cautious on York's campus, while another doesn't recommend the campus to Jewish students.

Uri Nachim, Betar-Tagar's co-president at York, remembers how in his first year, discussions between Arab and Jewish groups centred on how Israel and Palestine could peacefully coexist. Now, he said, the debate is about whether Israel should exist at all.

Dina Glatter, a York student, recalled an event organized to honour the Israel Defence Forces that was stormed by protesters, and signs saying, "IDF=Gestapo" remained in a central campus location for a week before being removed.

"It was a truly painful experience for me to see the things I stand for and love attacked with such venomous hate," Glatter told the audience.

"But let me tell you this: At times, I have felt marginalized and intimidated, but one thing I have never felt is ashamed of who I am and what I stand for."

Audience members Ida Shuman and Barbara Abraham said they were astonished at what they heard. They said they planned to donate to Betar-Tagar to help its cause.

"We're surprised the boards of the universities allow this to go on," said Shuman. "It's hatred. There should be a way to stop it."

Philip Wood, McMaster's associate vice-president of student affairs and dean of students, said the university does not permit signs that promote hate or discrimination, and clubs that violate these rules can be put on probation by the McMaster Students Union or disbanded altogether.

"We at McMaster University feel that universities generally should be the last bastions for free speech and conduct ourselves accordingly," he said.

"We do have policies in place that groups need to follow regarding posters and conducting events. Typically these are followed and events proceed without problem."

Representatives from U of T and York could not be reached for comment.

Students build a really big top

By JANICE ARNOLD

MONTREAL – What has four sides, spins and stands over 22 feet high?

A group of Jewish university students in Montreal are confident it is the world's biggest dreidel, and they have applied to Guinness World Records to have that fact established.

More than 20 students built the giant dreidel out of wood and particle board in the lobby of Congregation Beth Ora by for the West Island Hillel's Chanukah party.

With its base, the free-standing structure measured 25 feet, 9½ inches, said Hillel Montreal's Yoni Petel, but the dreidel itself was 22 feet, 2½ inches. The four Hebrew letters – shin, hey, gimel and nun – were each about six feet high and made of paper, which was taped on.

The dreidel did indeed spin on its base, with a good push from a tall person. "I'm 6-foot-2," said Petel, "and I could barely reach the face."

Rabbi Avi Rosenblatt, who authenticated its kashrut, and accountant Sandy Jesion, a vice-chair of the FEDERATION CJA West Island management committee, served as the witnesses necessary for consideration by Guinness.

Petel said the students were casting about for ideas on something different to do for Chanukah. "We had thought of making the world's biggest latke, but it would have been a fire hazard and we weren't really sure if we knew how to do it. A dreidel was the obvious second choice, and we checked with Guinness and found no dreidel entries."

Rabbi Avi Rosenblatt, left, and Sandy Jesion compare their miniature dreidels to one that may be the largest ever built.

The next question was where to construct it. They ruled out the outdoors because they were afraid of wind toppling their creation. The group looked on the West Island, but no synagogues or Jewish institutions had high enough ceilings to accommodate the top they envisioned. Beth Ora in St. Laurent was the closest alternative because its lobby soars almost three stories. Care had to be taken to avoid the chandelier. The dreidel took about nine hours to build, and involved working from a scaffold. It took about 10 students to lift it onto the base. Then the party began. "You could see about three-quarters of it outside through the window, making the synagogue look like a dollhouse," Petel said.

The costs of the dreidel were covered by an Innovation grant from National Jewish Campus Life.

Alas, the monster could only be kept up for two days. The students are keeping the parts and may try to reassemble the dreidel next year. "But we would be happy to donate it to anybody interested," Petel added.

Fund supports research into early childhood cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Like most new parents, Tami Moscoe and Eric Petersiel were thrilled when their first child, Lilah, was born, on April 14, 2004. Their joy turned to shock when on her first day of life she was diagnosed with neuroblastoma, a cancer of the nervous system.

Now, they have put their "nervous energy" as Moscoe put it, into Lilah's Fund, which supports research into this disease of early childhood.

A tumour was found almost accidentally, she said. An ultrasound during the pregnancy showed that Lilah had only one kidney. An abdominal scan to check on the kidney after birth found a golf-ball- sized tumour on one of her adrenal glands.

Lilah Moscoe

Surgery at the Hospital for Sick Children (now SickKids) removed the tumour and the adrenal gland to which it was attached. Lilah was two weeks old.

"The most important thing was how fast the diagnosis was made," Moscoe said. "If it isn't diagnosed before the first birthday, the prognosis is very poor."

It appeared that everything had gone perfectly. However, to everyone's surprise, three months later a routine CT scan found tumour clumps growing on her liver.

This time, the treatment was much more severe. Lilah had two rounds of chemotherapy – "to get rid of whatever they couldn't see on the CT scan," Moscoe said – followed by surgery, and then two more rounds of chemotherapy.

The baby was allowed to go home between bouts of chemotherapy and the surgery, but the family was constantly on edge trying to prevent any kind of infection, which would slow down the treatment. The family also had to return to SickKids with Lilah every couple of days to make sure everything was all right.

Lilah is now 19 months old, a cheerful, happy child with a lovely disposition, Moscoe said, who has been thriving in day care since August. She now goes back to the hospital regularly for follow-up.

During Lilah's treatment, the family began Lilah's Fund, working with the James Fund for Neuroblastoma Research. James Birrell was an eight-year-old boy from Peterborough, who died in 2001 after a five-year battle with the disease.

SickKids provides administration and physical support for the fund, which makes monies raised go further.

Moscoe and Petersiel decided to start the fund modestly, approaching friends and relatives directly, and aiming to raise $18,000. "We were blown away by how generous the personal donations were," said Moscoe.

This past June, on Fathers' Day, they organized Sunday in the Park with Lilah, an outdoor event at the Toronto French School. More than 100 families, plus the families of volunteers helping out, enjoyed raffles, silent auctions, inflatable castles, a walk, food, a barbecue, and appearances by Olympic athletes and singer Tressa.

So far, Lilah's Fund has raised nearly $80,000. It has sponsored two research projects, one to test new drugs ("they have to use adult drugs on the children – there are none designed specifically for children," Moscoe said) and another, in collaboration with Japanese researchers, on biomarkers.

Biomarkers are substances found in blood, body fluids or tissues that can indicate the presence of some kinds of cancer, including neuroblastoma.

Moscoe and Petersiel are planning to make Sunday in the Park with Lilah an annual event. They also hope to attract corporate supporters and sponsors.

For more information about Lilah's Fund, call Moscoe at 416-360-4734 or visit the website, www.lilahsfund.com.

Children can learn to control anger: psychologist

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Children are small, but as any parent knows, their anger is a powerful force.

Yet they're capable of learning strategies – many adapted from adult psychology – to bring it under control, said Gerard Klein, a clinical psychologist and consultant on children's mental health.

"Once they conquer it, children feel like a different type of person," he said at a recent Yetta Nashman Jewish Family Institute workshop for parents at the Village Shul.

Attention deficit or anxiety disorders, high-functioning autism, stress, or family situations like divorce are factors that influence children's anger, Klein said.

His approach to children's anger stems from a cognitive-behavioural model in which children take responsibility for their own anger. "I tell kids, no matter what's happening, there are things you can do to control your anger."

Klein suggested parents help children control their anger by logging the sequence of their anger in a simple ABC chart: A is the "activating event" that allows the child to describe initial triggers; B is his or her behaviour, positive or negative; and C is the consequences – both good and bad – of that behaviour.

We want kids to start learning what their pattern is, Klein said.

"There's often one person who gets them going, but it's not helpful for parents or teachers to point this out – there is a crucial element of self-discovery. There are many creative ways that even younger children can log their own anger – from drawings of thermometers to represent heat to the creative use of colour."

Children, and even some adults, may not be aware they're getting angry until it's too late, Klein said.

Children can look for physical cues that they're angry, such as hands held in fists, grinding teeth, flushed cheeks or body shaking. Parents can help them out by sharing what their own body cues are, he added.

After children start becoming aware of their anger and begin understanding that it's causing problems, Klein recommends using a variety of anger-reducing strategies. Many of them are similar to techniques used by adults.

Anger reducers include simple visualization and breathing exercises, which are helpful for almost all children. Young kids can be taught to take deep breaths by asking them to imagine blowing out candles. From ages eight and up, Klein recommends practising at least one period a day of 20 deep breaths. "You can't be angry and relaxed at the same time," he said.

Other anger-reducing strategies include physical activity – shooting hoops, counting backwards from 20 (not 10), using a "reminder" word or image, like "iceberg," to cool down or visualizing a stop sign. Not every strategy will work for every child. Kids should choose ones they like and can relate to, Klein said.

He emphasized parental influence in dealing with children's anger, noting that parents can reinforce the use of appropriate strategies. "Point it out and praise positive behaviour," he said. Tell a children that you really like the way they handled themselves, describe the strategy the child used, and ask what triggered their anger, he added.

Parents are also models, Klein said. "If there are angry parents, there will be angry kids." Parents who want their children to control anger should model anger-reducing strategies wherever possible.

And if a parent does react in an angry way, he or she should talk about it afterward. Even the littlest children have big ears and even from three floors away, "they'll hear what you're saying," Klein said.

Memoirist grew up Jewish in Toronto's Little Italy

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A comment that Saul Cantor's daughter, Rochelle, made more than five years ago inspired him to write his memoirs.

She said to him, in 2000, "I know some of the things about your life, but there are a lot of things I don't know," he writes in his recently published book, From Then to Now: Growing up Jewish in Toronto's Little Italy.

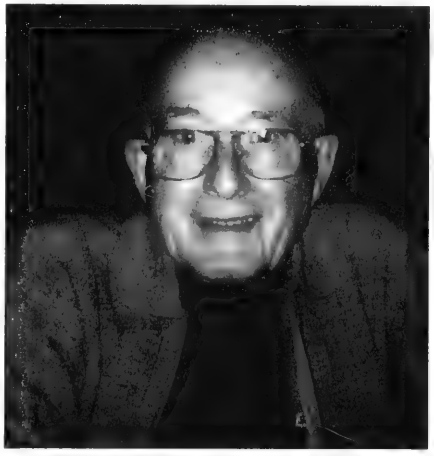
In the book, Cantor, 85, who calls himself "an ordinary man," urges other "ordinary people" to write their memoirs for their children, grandchildren and others to come. Cantor has a son, David, and two grandchildren.

From Then to Now is made up of vignettes in which Cantor, 85, describes his childhood and other phases of his life – his teen years, his work in the Royal Air Force (RAF) during World War II and his two marriages. He also writes about his children, business, and his active life filled with creative hobbies. The book includes photographs.

Cantor's grandparents, Jankel and Faiga Sandperl, were born in the mid-1800s in Poland. He dedicates his book to his parents – Nathan Contorowitz, who came to Canada from Kielce, Poland, and his mother, Gittel Pheffer, who came from Stashov, Poland. They met and married in Toronto in 1915.

"My father taught me by example – truth, courage, diligence and loyalty. He encouraged me in the adventures of life and I shall be forever grateful for that," Cantor says.

"My mother also taught me by example – love, compassion, charity and kindness. Her devotion to her husband and children was a lesson that I learned from her."



Saul Cantor

Cantor writes about the family's first home on Baldwin Street, then another one at 192 Bellwoods Ave., where he and his family lived among Italian immigrants.

"I had many Italian friends when I lived on Bellwoods Avenue and I still keep in touch with them," he says.

Cantor attended Grace Street Public School and Harbord Collegiate and Central Technical School.

In his memoir, he tells of his summers at Fenlon Falls, Camp B'nai Brith at Willow Beach, and Smith's Bay House at Port Carling. He reminisces about Bellwoods Park, the YMHA on Brunswick Avenue, the library on St. George Street (two blocks east of the corner of Spadina Avenue and College Street) and his buddies and their antics.

"I didn't have a bar mitzvah when I was 13 years old because of the Depression. I went to the Farband Shula and the Euclid Talmud Torah. But I did have a bar mitzvah at the Adath Sholom Synagogue in 1979 with seven other men when I was in my mid 50s," Cantor says.

"I guess you can say it is better late than never."

In 1940, Cantor and two of his friends applied to the air force. He was rejected because as a child he had tuberculosis. A civilian during the war, he worked for the RAF at Gander, Nfld., as a mechanic in the Ferry Command.

"That's where the large airplanes were checked before being flown to Scotland for active duty," he says.

"My two friends were killed in active duty."

Cantor writes about his business career after World War II, including working at the Junction Sports Centre on Dundas Street West.

Cantor retired 20 years ago and says he tries his best to keep as active as he can. "I think it is important to exercise my body and my brain every day. My wife, Goldie, and I have a lot of interests in common, antiquing, outdoor activities, travelling and dancing.

"It is also very important to be forgiving and not to carry a grudge. I think that you have to love yourself first because if you don't learn to love yourself, you can't love others."

Terror from Gaza down since pullout, Mofaz says

By GIDEON ALON and AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ASHKELON — The number of casualties in terror attacks that originated from Gaza has dropped significantly since Israel left the territory, and while 61 suicide bombings emerged from Gaza in 2002, 2005 saw only five such attacks, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said last week.

Speaking on a visit to the southern city of Ashkelon, Mofaz also said that Al Qaeda has been trying to gain a foothold in Jordan and Egypt and continuously works to establish terror cells inside Israel, but that these attempts have all failed so far.

Mofaz visited Ashkelon at the invitation of Mayor Roni Mahtzari after Gaza terror groups fired Qassam rockets at the city.

Mofaz said Israel would do its utmost to prevent Qassam fire from Gaza and that all those involved in rocket launches are prime targets for the Israel Defence Forces.

In related developments, Chief of Staff Dan Halutz said last week that he does not think the IDF will act soon against Iran's nuclear program.

"I do not believe an IDF operation against the Iranians will be necessary soon," Halutz told Army Radio.

Halutz said he believes Iran will be able to produce a nuclear bomb within the next decade. But he differentiated between the "point of no return" when Iran acquires the independent technological capability to make the bomb and when it can complete the process.

Mossad chief Meir Dagan told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee last week that Iran could cross the point of no return in a matter of months.

Halutz also said that all political options to torpedo the Iranian nuclear program should be exhausted before any other action is considered. He said those efforts have successfully delayed Tehran's plans by two years.

Halutz also said that because Iran doesn't yet have a nuclear bomb, it doesn't constitute an existential threat to Israel. "When there is an existential threat, a country must take every action to ensure its existence," he said.

Dagan told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee that Iran wants to produce more than one nuclear bomb. He warned that within a number of months, Iran will attain technological independence, and that the subsequent development of a nuclear bomb will only be a matter of time. But he refused to predict when Iran would be able to produce a bomb.

Spielberg film elicits strong doubts in Israel

Spielberg shows Avner's doubts growing over time and under operational duress. Munich posits that the hero was the leader of a diverse group of agents assigned to track down a rogue's gallery of wanted men from the Black September faction of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

For dramatic effect, the assassins are isolated in the field, left to their own devices by an Israeli high command loath to risk exposure.

But such a set-up flies in the face of logic, as well as logistics, according to Israelis in the know.

"There was never a single list of targets drawn up, and certainly never a single hit-team assigned to handle them," a retired Mossad deputy chief said on condition of anonymity.

"It was a matter of putting out the word to our people who were posted in various countries to look out for top Black September members. When these were located, then we sent out the right agents to take care of business, on a more ad-hoc basis."

Munich rightly notes that Golda Meir, Israel's prime minister at the time of the Olympics attack, authorized the Mossad to go on the offensive – this was an executive decision.

But the film has elicited strong doubts in Israel by showing Meir personally recruiting Avner for the mission.

"C'mon, like any intelligence agency we had the right people trained and ready to go. The idea of a prime minister meeting with a junior field agent is unthinkable – it's bad for secrecy, for a start, not to mention completely unnecessary," said one veteran of Mossad operations at the time.

When asked about the Mossad's criticism, Dennis Ross, the former U.S. Middle East envoy, characterized them as fair.

"This is a movie," said Ross, who served as a consultant to Spielberg on the film. "There's no claim that it's a documentary."

Then there is the peculiarly international composition of Spielberg's hit team, with Avner apparently being the only Israeli-born agent.

While the Mossad is known to seek out agents with foreign citizenships and mastery of foreign languages, veterans say it is rare for someone without an established Israeli pedigree to be recruited. Always on the lookout for potential moles or double agents, the Mossad is unlikely to take on someone whose personal history is not intricately tied to the Jewish state.

Remarkably, the agents in Munich are also all male. This flies in the face of a notorious, and fully documented, Mossad operation at the time: the 1973 killing in Norway of a Moroccan waiter who was mistaken for the Black September chief. Two women were among the Israeli agents tried for murder in that case.

"In espionage, like in police work, there is nothing better than having a woman accomplice on hand," said Shimron. "If you are on a stakeout – say, waiting in a car – and have a lady with you, you are far less likely to be questioned."

According to Munich, the hit team had its expenses paid out of a Swiss bank account, but still had to keep receipts – something Mossad veterans say is simply bad trade.

"The whole point of being a spy is having a cover, and having a cover usually means you have a legitimate-sounding and normal source of income," said one. "So why shlep all the way to Switzerland? As for keeping receipts, why provide the authorities with a paper trail if you are caught?"

But Ross said Spielberg had a different goal in mind.

"In the end, I think he wanted to make a movie that was a compelling story to begin with. No. 2, I think he wanted to at least highlight some of the dilemmas that you face when responding to terror."

According to most authoritative accounts, Israel's hunt for Black September continued over two decades, with the final death toll reaching close to 20. But Spielberg's version leads the audience to believe that just 11 terrorists were on the hit list.

"There are 11 Jews killed in Munich, 11 Palestinians that we killed – in other words, 'tit for tat' and 'an eye for an eye,'" Michael Bar-Zohar, who wrote an authorized history of the reprisals, told Israel Radio. "This balancing act is simply outrageous, because anyone who sees our fight with those who want to destroy us as balanced does not know what he is talking about."

The director admits inventing a scene entirely at one point in the plot. It shows a PLO man lecturing Avner on the justice of the Palestinian quest for a homeland.

Without that exchange, Spielberg told Time magazine, "I would have been making a Charles Bronson movie – good guys versus bad guys and Jews killing Arabs without any context. And I was never going to make that picture."

Israeli fashions shown on campus runways across Canada

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — For as long as Lena Avronin can remember, she has been designing clothes.

"Fashion is my passion and has been since I was a child," says the 25-year-old who recently graduated from the fashion design BA program at Bezalel Academy of Art and Design in Jerusalem.

"A culture's desire to dress a certain way is an expression of its ceaseless desire to recreate itself," she says. "In Israel, where the world of fashion has virtually exploded over the past few years, this is especially true."

This recent "explosion" of Israeli fashion creativity accounts for the success of Fashion for Passion, a program initiated by the Toronto-based National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL), which is funded by the United Israel Appeal (UIA). NJCL provides resources to Hillel and other Jewish campus centres across Canada. Last March, for its inaugural year, Fashion for Passion brought the creations of six Israeli designers to runways in Vancouver, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto.

Audiences ranged in size from 300 to 800 and people paid $18 each – with proceeds going to the One Family Fund for victims of terror – to see the latest lines by Doreen Frankfurt, Ronen Chen, Sasson Kedem, Segal Dekel, Mirit Weinstock, Zoe and Yael Orgad, all of whom have boutiques in Israel, and most of whom have their labels in the United States or Europe.

A sample of what's to come down the catwalk.

"The idea for the event came out of the desire to show Israel beyond the conflict," says NJCL's Ryla Braemer. "When you read about Israel, you read about terror and politics. You don't read about the country's fashion. But Israel's fashion industry is very cutting edge."

In addition, says Braemer, fashion is a field that interests most students, both male and female. "We thought it would be a good way for Jewish students across the country to reach out to their fellow students and local communities and show them a side of Israel that most people don't get to see, or don't think about."

They are working toward making this year's event – which will raise money for a thus-far unnamed Israeli charity – bigger than last year's, Braemer says. It will take place again in March, on more campuses and involve more designers.

Frankfurt says it is "important to show the world that Israel is not just some 'Wild West' checkpoint for Jews fulfilling the Jewish dream of living in the Holy Land". She is the only Israeli designer who still has a manufacturing plant in Tel Aviv, and has since 1982.

"There is wonderful real life and real creativity here and that is very important. A country that does not create is a country that does not exist."

Weinstock, a Tel Aviv-based designer, agrees that it's important to show the world a different side of Israel. She is among at least five new Israeli artists who will be participating in this year's Fashion for Passion.

"Israel has a strong fashion culture. There is a lot going on here," says Weinstock, whose women's boutique, Reine, is located on Dizengoff Street, Tel Aviv's most prestigious fashion strip.

Not all of this year's Fashion for Passion designers have shops on Dizengoff. And this year's designers are a much more mixed bag than last year's. Designers at different stages of their career and from various backgrounds will be introduced. They include Avronin, a recent graduate; Kami Cadan and Ronit Sherf, who have a joint label; Robata; and Tel Aviv-based Zahava Sobel, who designs especially for religious women.

"This year, we have different faces and names," says Sarah Wilner, Fashion for Passion's Israel-based recruiter, who made aliyah from Montreal five months ago.

"In addition to showcasing the work of established designers, we wanted to give a chance to upcoming ones. Especially since the show is geared toward students abroad, why not involve Israeli students too? We want as many talented designers in Israel as possible to have the opportunity to show their clothes and expose their creations to Canadian audiences."

Weinstock says she is trying to "open to an international market, so it is important for her to show her work to new audiences. Her label is carried by Rosebud in New York City, and she will be participating in a fashion show in Denmark in May. But Fashion for Passion is giving her a first opportunity to penetrate the Canadian market. She will be sending 10 outfits – representing her autumn, winter, spring and summer lines – to the shows in Canada.

Avronin says she is delighted that her collection "is travelling to participate in such large cities. I hope it will be the first step to help me realize my dream of entering the world of professional design. It could be the beginning of a new life. I think Canadian audiences will be pleasantly surprised to see that in Israel, there is also good taste and interest in fashion."

According to Frankfurt, the Israeli lifestyle has given birth to a new fashion trend, which has caught on in different places around the world. "The Israeli lifestyle is caught somewhere between the weather and relaxation of an island in Greece and urban life," she says, offering the example of Israeli businesspeople who work in prestigious, high-tech firms, but at the same time choose to eat their lunch in cafés, rather than in fancy restaurants.

"It's relaxed but stylish, and it's the unique Israeli look," she notes, adding that the look is so distinct, she would be capable of picking out an Israeli designer crossing the street in Covent Garden in London.

Weinstock says that in the past few years, "Israel has produced a lot of young designers who are not afraid to open stores or to produce creative, new catalogues." She attributes part of the industry's creative boom to the presence, in Israel, of internationally reputed schools such as Shenkar School of Engineering and Design in Tel Aviv and the Bezalel Academy in Jerusalem.

"There are a lot of very creative people in Tel Aviv," says Weinstock

Sobel is one such creative designer participating in this year's Fashion for Passion. "It unites two parts of the world together, through art – and art is the most effective way to bring people together," she says.

Frankfurt concurs. "Design is the best way to spread feelings of community," she says.

Wilner observes that Fashion for Passion "really is the perfect awareness project – both for Israeli designers and Canadian audiences."

Science hostel opens in Jerusalem

By SIMON GRIVER
(IPS)

JERUSALEM — At first glance there is nothing exceptional about Beit Bretter – an attractive building of Jerusalem stone located on the Hebrew University's Edmund Safra Givat Ram Campus.

But Beit Bretter, which opened its doors in July 2005, is a unique hostel that offers students from disadvantaged communities in Israel a once-in-a-lifetime educational experience – the opportunity to participate in concentrated science camps and at the same time learn about the role of Jerusalem as Israel's political, cultural and historic capital.

Made possible by the late Ernest Bretter, a Dutch Holocaust survivor who lived in the United States, the Jerusalem Foundation built the hostel, at a cost of $4.4 million (US), together with the Hebrew University and Jerusalem municipality.

"Beit Bretter's location makes it unique," said Yitzhak Parnas, emeritus professor of neuroscience at the Hebrew University who initiated Beit Bretter when he served as chairman of the Hebrew University's Authority for the Community and Youth.

"It is adjacent to the Belmonte Science Laboratories Center, thereby providing high school students with state-of-the art university laboratories and academic teaching, and is also in the heart of Jerusalem's government complex, within walking distance of the Knesset and Supreme Court," said Parnas.

"The lessons given to the students about the history of Jerusalem and Israeli government institutions are of the same high academic level as the science curriculum. They come here as students not as tourists."

The internationally acclaimed Belmonte Center offers leading-edge scientific instruction in biology, chemistry, physics, computer science, biotech, ecology, microelectronics and electro-optics to some 50 high schools in the Jerusalem region – Jewish, Muslim and Christian.

"Although more than 20,000 students in the Jerusalem region benefit from the Belmonte Laboratories each year, we felt frustrated that students elsewhere in Israel did not have the opportunity to come here," said Shabtai Dover, director of the Hebrew University's Authority for the Community and Youth.

"Building a hostel like Beit Bretter now means that 5,000 more students can use Belmonte each year."

Since the start of the academic year, Beit Bretter, with its 18 bedrooms and 72 beds, dining room, youth clubroom and esthetically pleasing décor, has hosted high school youth from Ra'anana, Kiryat Ono near Tel Aviv, the Bedouin town of Tuba Zagariya, and more recently from Kiryat Yam near Haifa for weeklong stays.

"We spent this morning in the biology laboratories learning about the damage done by smoking," said Vered Isakov, 15, from Kiryat Yam. "We were shown the lungs of a normal, healthy pig and then the lungs of a pig which were completely black from secondary smoking.

"Yesterday we were in the Old City," she added, "and this afternoon we went around the Israel Museum. I have been to Jerusalem before, but this is the first time I've been able to fully appreciate the city and understand its importance for Jews and Israelis."

Milena Mironyuk, a Grade 10 teacher from Kiryat Yam who accompanied the students, immigrated to Israel from Ukraine in 1990. "Of the 36 teenagers in my class only one has parents who were born in Israel," she said. "Almost all their parents were born in the former Soviet Union, so coming here to Jerusalem and learning about Jewish history and the importance of our democratic institutions has been especially important."

Avi Karpel, 15, from Kiryat Yam, was born three months after his parents immigrated to Israel from the Ukraine. "This morning I was in the physics lab learning about waves and optics. It was fascinating. I want to work in high-tech when I've finished the army and university."

Beit Bretter and the Belmonte Center form part of a "Youth Science Complex" at Givat Ram, which also includes the Joseph Meyerhoff Youth Center for Advanced Scientific Studies – for curious elementary schoolchildren seeking extra-curricular enrichment activities – and the Bloomfield Science Museum.

"The beauty of our Science and Jerusalem program is that it creates an excellent balance for the students," said Parnas. "However fascinating the experiments performed in the Belmonte Center may be, you cannot expect teenagers to be stuck in laboratories for 12 hours at a time. So they spend half the program in laboratories and the other half outside in Jerusalem. It works very well."

Ruth Cheshin, president of the Jerusalem Foundation, said "Beit Bretter is rapidly becoming one of the most desirable destinations for Israeli high schools seeking stimulating new challenges for their students."

Immigration to Israel up

Immigration to Israel from North America and France rose in 2005, according to the Jewish Agency for Israel. Some 3,052 people moved to Israel from North America, an increase from 2,640 in 2004, and 2,980 came from France, a rise from 2,415 the year before. Overall, an estimated 23,000 immigrants will arrive before Dec. 31, a slight increase from 2004. Immigration from the former Soviet Union dropped by 10 per cent, although the 9,124 people who came still made up 40 per cent of all new immigrants. In addition, 29,712 young Jews took part in short-term programs to Israel, while 5,583 took part in longer-term educational programs. Both of these numbers were up from 2004.

First woman university head

A woman will become president of an Israeli university for what is believed to be the first time. Dr. Rivka Carmi, a pediatrician and geneticist, was named president of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. Carmi replaces Avishai Braverman, who left his post to enter politics as a candidate for the Labor Party in the next Knesset elections.

Iraqi Jews to visit hometown

A group of Iraqi-born Jews in Israel are planning a trip to their hometown. A dozen people will make the trip to Mosul this spring, the Jerusalem Post reported. A Kurdish guide will help coordinate the trip. An estimated 120,000 Jews left Iraq in the 1950s, with most going to Israel.

Population nears 7 million

Israel's population is nearing seven million. Seventy-six per cent of Israel's 6,986,300 people are Jewish, according to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics. Twenty per cent are Arab and four per cent are non-Arab Christians or residents with no official religious status.

Bomber kills soldier

A Palestinian suicide bomber blew himself up at a West Bank checkpoint last week, killing an Israeli army officer. The Islamic Jihad terrorist was apparently en route to Israel when the taxi he was taking was stopped at a surprise military roadblock. Asked by troops to leave the vehicle, the bomber detonated his load, killing himself and an Israeli soldier, Lt. Ori Binamo, 21. Three other soldiers were wounded, and a Palestinian in the taxi, who security sources said might also have been from Islamic Jihad, was killed. The Palestinian Authority issued a statement condemning the bombing as "against the national interests of the Palestinian people."

No-go zone in Gaza

Israel declared off-limits an area of the Gaza Strip that Palestinians have used to fire rockets into Israel. The ordinance went into effect at 6 p.m. last Wednesday, after the Israeli Air Force dropped thousands of leaflets over Gaza warning residents not to approach land abutting the northern boundary where Jewish settlements had been located. "Anyone who will not heed this warning is placing his or her life in immediate danger," read the leaflets, which included a map of the new buffer zone. Israel vowed to step up counter-measures after Palestinian rockets with extended range were fired from Gaza at the Israeli coastal city of Ashkelon and two army bases. Five IDF soldiers were wounded in the attack on their base.

Sharon to undergo cardiac procedure

Ariel Sharon is scheduled to have a minor heart operation. Doctors for the 77-year-old Israeli prime minister, going public with his medical record, said that Sharon's mild stroke last month was caused by a blood clot traced to a hole in his heart. A common birth defect, the tiny hole will be sealed with a cardiac catheterization in the next two or three weeks, they said.

Postcard from Jerusalem in wintertime

By DONALD CARR

The Jerusalem Post headline, read on Air Canada from Toronto to Tel Aviv, said the rabbis have been praying for rain in Israel. There is a drought across the country and the winter rain is needed.

"Don't worry," I feel like telling my Israeli friends. "The Carrs are on their way!"

Sure enough, like clockwork, on the second day after our arrival, the drought ended. The temperature plummeted and the rain descended in sheets. From then on, there was drizzle, followed by more sheets of rain, intermittent weak sun, wind-blown clouds, cold and dampness.

Ah, idyllic winter vacations in Israel!

Yes, Eilat is 23 degrees as I write. And, although Jerusalem is 11 degrees and raining, if you are staying in a hotel, you are warm and comfortable.

But, try living in an average 45-year-old Jerusalem apartment building, like ours, and you will wonder, "Where are the warmer climes?"

The walls of our building, with its seven individual apartment units, are made of stone that's perfect for keeping the cold and dampness inside.

The building has an antiquated, oil-fired hot-water heating system. We have one radiator in each of our rooms and one in the hallway, for a total of six, counting the bathroom. We have replaced three of them, and now have a trio of brand new, baked white-enamel radiators instead of the former cast iron monsters, which developed leaks and spread rusty water across our ceramic tile floors.

All that is lacking for 22 out of 24 hours is hot water!

By custom, the "keeper of the furnace-room key" (the one apartment owner who constitutes the va'ad bayit – the equivalent of a condominium board of directors – as the only permanent occupant of the building who is not afflicted with Alzheimer's or has suffered a stroke) has set the automatic furnace timer to go on at 5:30 p.m. and shut off at 7:30 p.m.

In those two hours, the temperature is so high that it's dangerous to touch a radiator with bare hands, although it's ideal for draping wet laundry, which, with no clothes dryer, would otherwise be hanging, permanently soaked, on the clothesline outside.

Four years ago – the last time we were here at this time of the year – I obtained unlawful access to the furnace room and was able to tiptoe into the basement and re-set the timer.

Day one saw the furnace start an hour earlier and stop one hour later, with no untoward reaction from the apartments! On day two, the furnace went on at 3:30 p.m. and stopped at 9:30 p.m. Still no complaints!

Day three was D-Day. I lowered the thermostat on the furnace (the only temperature control in the building) and set the furnace to work constantly, so that each apartment was probably at about 16 or 17 degrees.

At last, the bone-chilling dampness was checked and a modicum of comfort prevailed – but only for a short while.

About a day later, the building's residents, accustomed to being huddled around their chilblain-producing heaters, started to complain that the building was unusually hot. They were "boiling" and the electric sheets on their beds (substitutes here for electric blankets) made it impossible to sleep!

No amount of logic would persuade them that they were saving very expensive electricity by turning off their heaters, that they were actually saving on costly oil (because the furnace no longer had to heat the radiators to a level where an egg could be fried on them) and that they had a much healthier home environment, resulting in fewer attacks of colds, flu and pneumonia, which they all lived with every winter.

The heating schedule had to be returned to the useless regimen that existed before the temporary aliens arrived.

However, this year there is no hope of achieving even a few days of stolen relative comfort.

We are back to having electric heaters blazing away whenever we are at home. That makes it possible for us to eat in the living-room, instead of on our enclosed balcony, which normally serves as our dining room during those sensible months from about April to October, but is now freezing.

Try taking your bare feet out of bed at 7 a.m. (or earlier, if you are obliged to) and putting them onto an ice-cold tile floor. Let's face it, it was really a summer cottage that we bought in Jerusalem 24 years ago. And only the bat mitzvah of our oldest Israeli granddaughter has brought us here in December!

It's lunchtime in a beautiful restaurant in the Talpiot district of Jerusalem. There are no tourists expected here and the menu is all in Hebrew (our Achilles heel, despite numerous attempts to learn). The waitress's English is not good enough to translate the lunch menu, so, since the breakfast menu appears to be relatively straightforward, we order fresh orange juice, omelette, fresh rolls, chopped tomato and cucumber salad, pastry and hot tea.

This is a photo of the snow that fell on Mount Hermon during the week of "cold and dampness" that the author experienced in Jerusalem. It was a cold week in Israel. [Israel Sun photo]

The restaurant is cavernous and cold. We are all wearing coats. We ask (partially with meaningful gesticulations) if the restaurant has heating. The waitress makes it clear that it does. We indicate that we cannot feel it. She points to the circular outlets in the ceiling.

"Heaters," she says.

"But they're not working!" I exclaim.

"You're right. What kind of cheese do you want in your omelette?"

We eat lunch in our coats. No use getting upset about it any more.

My rented car gets a parking ticket, notwithstanding the fact I have purchased the proper parking receipt and displayed it in the window. The fine is 250 shekels (about $60). How can I get it cancelled?

I go to the parking authority office at City Hall. The police officer on duty speaks English. I explain the situation to him.

"You have a rented car?" he asks.

"Yes."

"You live in Canada," he asks, examining my passport.

"Yes."

"When are you leaving the country?"

"Next week."

Without batting an eyelash, he tells me not to pay the ticket.

Don't tell the car rental company, he advises. In four or five months the city will notify the car rental company and demand payment, he says. The car rental company will write back, advising that the driver of the car was a foreigner and has left the country. The ticket will be cancelled.

The car rental company will charge my Visa $20 for the correspondence.

"That's better than paying 250 shekels," he says with a smile, then turns to the next unfortunate driver.

I leave the building shaking my head.

One still gets a sense of great security as one moves around Jerusalem, shopping, eating in restaurants, visiting unique places of interest, and parking in underground lots.

Alert security guards look you in the eye. You pass through electronic detectors. Security wands are passed over your body, like at airports. If you are driving into a parking lot or shopping centre, they examine your trunk and glove compartment.

Yes, every so often there is a horrible "incident" somewhere in the country, and, doubtless, there are terrorist attempts are thwarted daily, without publicity.

Yet, life goes on. Citizens – still listening to the hourly news on the radio in buses, cars, restaurants or at home – and this year, thank goodness, many tourists, go about their pursuits. With the number of recent shootings in Toronto, one doesn't think twice about the possible dangers in this beautiful land, where everyone still yearns for peace and the right to live their lives unmolested by the surrounding millions.

It's Christmastime and it's appropriate to face facts about the holy birthplace of Jesus.

For too long, the media have repeated Palestinian Arab propaganda about Israel's alleged oppression of Christian Bethlehem.

Christian Bethlehem?

True, at one time, more than 90 per cent of the population of that city was Christian. But today, less than a quarter of Bethlehem is Christian – and the numbers are dropping rapidly. Sadly, Christians feel neither safe nor at home in a Palestinian environment that echoes Islamist tendencies so stridently. They are concerned about their future.

Just what is that future?

Judging from the recent past, the concerns of Bethlehem's Christians have substance.

Just before Christmas, hundreds of armed Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade gunmen laid siege to Manger Square, demanding from the municipality positions in the Palestinian Authority's "security forces."

It was only a little more than three years ago that members of the same group forcibly occupied the Church of the Nativity for several weeks.

They also "invaded" Christian Beit Jala, a town immediately across the valley from Jerusalem's Gilo district. There, with Christians obliged to flee or forced to be virtual human shields, they let loose a barrage of gunfire from Christian homes onto unprotected Jewish apartments in Gilo, lasting on and off, day and night – for weeks.

Why does one hear virtually nothing from other Christian communities about all this? Is their silence born of the fear that they will make things worse for their co-religionists who still live in Palestinian-controlled territory? Or, do they find little in common with them?

It is very hard for Jews, who feel responsible for each other, wherever they may be, to understand this.

Artist discovers his talent for painting later in life

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

It's never too late to discover that you have a hidden talent.

Six years ago, retired civil engineer Arkady Burman, now 75, discovered he had a talent and passion for painting.

He was watching a television show in which an artist was demonstrating some painting techniques and selling oil paints and brushes.

"I phoned and ordered the whole package, which came with instructions. I thought I would try it for $30 or $40. I didn't know I had any artistic ability, although I had to draft at work."

He says he did not remember ever painting before.

"I made the first strokes with a trembling hand. I painted a few landscapes, and then I grew more ambitious.

"My friends advised me to paint from real life, so I installed a mirror on the table and made my first self-portrait."

As a surprise gift for his daughter, he painted his first portrait of her from a photograph.

He went on to paint more portraits, landscapes, figures, paintings on Jewish themes and other pictures.

His first exhibition was in the auditorium of his apartment building in 2002, and then his work was shown at the Brookbanks Public Library, where he received rave reviews. He has since had two more successful exhibitions.

He is now exhibiting his paintings in the library at Mel Lastman Square until Feb. 1, 2006.

Burman, who was born in Kiev, became as a civil engineer there, but in the evenings and in his spare time, he appeared in concerts and recitals, serious drama productions and several movies.

"I love music and acting and I thought my destiny was to be an actor."

During the war, he and other Jews were evacuated to the Ural Mountains when the Germans came to Kiev. Recently, his cousin in Israel sent him two paintings that Burman had created when he was 10 years old in Russia. One was of some Russian tanks and the other was his cousin's mother sitting in her kitchen.

"I don't remember painting them," he says.

He came to Canada in 1980 and worked as a consulting structural engineer. "It was during the 1980 and 1990 recessions, and I didn't have time to think much about performing or looking for other interests."

Still, he continued to perform at parties and gatherings, where he did readings and sang, mostly for friends.

He retired at the age of 65 in 1995 and says he then had time to pursue some of his hobbies. A few years later, he watched the television program that changed his life.

He has never taken formal painting lessons. "Every painting I do is something new for me," he says. "It is like beginning from darkness – then something comes from inside me."

When asked about his future as a painter he comments, "Galleries sell names, not paintings. My purpose is to express myself and to enjoy what I am doing. I am very happy that I have found this talent – it is a miracle that I became an artist."

Many visitors to his exhibitions have written enthusiastic thank-you notes, including some from established artists. Some examples: "beautiful, spiritual, living portraits"; "your landscapes leave you with the feeling of peaceful serenity and connection to nature"; "Arkady Burman has been blessed by God with the gift of art"; "the work I have seen today has made me believe that it is never too late to express yourself;" "The colour and beauty in his paintings is brilliant and enjoyable to view."

Arkady Burman's website is www.artburman.com. For more information about his exhibition at Mel Lastman Square, call 416-227-0412.

Concert series showcases Canadian composer Steven Gellman

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

In a cozy, intimate recital hall on Sunday afternoons, 100 or so people gather in Toronto to take in the sounds of dynamic chamber music.

Unlike grand concerts featuring only the classics, these performances highlight the works of Canadian composers in a warm environment.

"The concept of focusing on one Canadian composer throughout the season [and] integrating his or her different chamber works within the familiar repertoire is a unique format," says Dorothy Sandler-Glick, 68, artistic director of the Syrinx Sunday Salons.

Steven Gellman

"The idea is to present new works that people really don't know."

Performed at Heliconian Hall in the Yorkville area, the salons are inviting affairs, with close contact between the audience and musicians.

"There is a warmth to it which is why I like the Heliconian," says Sandler-Glick.

"We give a reception afterward and the people stay round and talk to the performers and composers. It's really a lovely feeling."

Each season, five recitals showcase the works of a Canadian composer, along with incorporating more popular chamber pieces.

Ottawa composer Steven Gellman is the salon's current Canadian feature artist.

"I find his music… to be very mystical," Sandler-Glick says.

"There are some beautiful melodies and interesting rhythms. I find most of his work strikes me because he has this melancholy mysticism."

The next show offers a piano soloist, and other salons will include a piano quartet, a flute and guitar duo and then a string quartet.

Sandler-Glick, the widow of famed Canadian composer Srul Irving Glick and a revered pianist herself, said the genesis of the salons goes back to her parents, who used to host similar musical shows in their home.

"Then about five years ago, a friend of mine, Christopher Clark, said, 'I have a bit of money and I think it would be great to start some musicales,'" Sandler-Glick recalls.

Sandler-Glick's daughter, Paula, introduced the concept of focusing on a Canadian composer.

Clark and Sandler-Glick's brother, Arthur Sandler, were the original sponsors, but later on, Sandler-Glick and company linked up with Syrinx Concerts Toronto.

In previous years, the salons have featured music composed by Sandler-Glick's late husband and Oskar Morawetz.

"The people who learned Oskar Morawetz's music for this recital used them in other concerts and I was very happy to hear that," Sandler-Glick says.

She has similar hopes for Gellman's work.

"We want to attract everybody, but certainly, we want young people to hear this music…so they'll be encouraged or inspired to use Steven Gellman's works in concert," she says.

The artistic director says it's been a challenge getting the salons to grow, but the hall is filling up more and more with each show.

"This is a great and enjoyable adventure for me," she says.

"I feel really lucky to have this opportunity."

As for the future, Sandler-Glick has a grand vision.

"I sort of have a dream, one of these years, to present a year of string quartets, interposed with different composers. But my big dream… is to be able to produce concerts in other countries in order to introduce Canadian music performed by promising young Canadian musicians."

For tickets, contact Dorothy Sandler-Glick at 416-654-0877 or Julie at 416-699-4949. The next show is on Feb. 5.

'A nice heimishe Christmas card for the Royals'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Tom Sandler's photographs have appeared in newspapers and magazines throughout the world, but he says he never believed that one of his photographs would be on "a nice heimishe Christmas card for the Royals."

Fifteen years ago, Sandler volunteered to photograph the Duke of Edinburgh Awards, which honours outstanding young people. That photo session brought him recognition from royalty.

"Over the years, I have developed a rapport with members of the Royal Family and their Canadian representatives," he says.

Last June, Sandler photographed the Earl and Countess of Wessex – Prince Edward, the youngest son of Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip, and his wife, Sophie – while they were in Canada on an official visit.

A photograph Sandler took at Queen's Park at an aboriginal ceremony hosted by Ontario's lieutenant-governor, James Bartleman, was selected by the earl and the countess for their Christmas card.

"They sent me a signed card from the palace. I was thrilled. They are delightful people to work with – very hard working and extremely charitable. I've established a wonderful relationship and friendship with them," Sandler says

He adds that he also took the photo for the lieutenant-governor's Christmas card. "I was honoured that the Bartlemans also picked my photo."

Sandler works closely with his wife, Aline, who is also a photographer. "We were the official photographers for other members of the Royal Family, including Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip when they were here for the 50th anniversary of her coronation," he says.

He adds that photographing the Royals is "pretty intense because of the protocol and security that surrounds them. It is not as intense to photograph the younger generation."

Sandler says he finds it exciting to work with the Royals – and he enjoys the perks. "One of the best perks is being able to ride in the royal motorcade."

The Sandlers have photographed many other famous people, including Nelson Mandela, Margaret Thatcher, Audrey Hepburn and the Rolling Stones.

Tom Sandler displays a signed Christmas card with the photograph he took of Prince Edward and his wife, Sophie.

TOURING PRODUCTION OF GOLDA'S BALCONY, STARRING VALERIE HARPER, COMING IN MAY

Golda's Balcony, the acclaimed one-woman play by William Gibson, is coming to Toronto this spring with former television star Valerie Harper ("Rhoda") in the role of Golda Meir.

According to reviews, the play succeeds in capturing the personality of the woman whom Shimon Peres – who was both her political ally and her rival said possessed "the power to tear down barriers, to open hearts and to penetrate deeply" into human souls with her words.

Among other subjects, Golda's Balcony highlights the theme of Israel's once-secret nuclear weapons program. The title refers both to the balcony in Tel Aviv from which Golda viewed the country's growth, and her observation deck at the once-secret nuclear plant at Dimona in the Negev desert.

In a 2002 interview, playwright Gibson (whose most famous work is The Story of Helen Keller) related that Golda's Balcony grew out of his 1978 play Golda. Freighted with a big cast and expensive special effects, the earlier work failed to rouse audiences, he acknowledged.

The significantly revised play utilizes a single performer portraying the charismatic prime minister who led Israel from 1969 to 1974; it has been touring North America to excellent reviews. By most accounts, it manages to capture Golda's special qualities, including the memorable oratorical talent that Peres described in the New York Times in 2003.

"When Golda opened her mouth to speak, a metamorphosis took place," he wrote. "Her small physical stature would recede, giving way to an imposing and powerful persona, which generated a climate of confidence and faith, creating a world where excitement replaced fear.

"Without wasting words and doing away with written notes, she would make her political stand clear in a few simple words declaring, 'We do not wish to rule over a million Arabs who do not want us to'; or sarcastically pronouncing, 'The Arabs have become so rich, they can buy anything – even anti-Semitism'; or again, when she remarked that 'we shall never forgive the Arabs for forcing us to educate our children to fight them back.'"

Golda's Balcony spotlights the 80-year-old Golda, reminiscing upon the best of times and the worst of times in Israel's dramatic history. The play also probes what Gibson saw as Golda's loss of idealism through her long service to the Jewish people. "Although just one woman, and one 90-minute act, the overall effect is of a stage peopled by a full cast and varied by multiple scene changes," one reviewer observed.

CJN Profile

Father and daughter celebrate release of their books

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When Devyani Saltzman was a little girl growing up on the sets of her father's television productions, including Danger Bay and My Secret Identity, she knew she didn't want to follow in his footsteps.

"I never wanted to have anything to do with [filmmaking and television]. I wanted to be a biologist. I did my degree in sociology, anthropology and biology at Oxford University, and my best subject was genetics. But I always wanted to write," said Saltzman, the 25-year-old only child of producer and filmmaker Paul Saltzman and director Deepa Mehta.

"My interest was in a totally different medium and it always has been. I never particularly wanted to be a filmmaker," she added.

Without hesitation, she said that writing is her biggest passion.

"I think it is the only way I feel a sense of pure engagement with the world through words. It's how I understand the world around me and I love the art of it. When I write, I feel connected," she said.

Her first book, Shooting Water, is a non-fiction account of the struggle to produce her mother's film Water while attempting to rebuild their relationship which was strained by her parents' divorce.

"When I was 11, my parents divorced and I chose to live with my dad and he had full custody. As an only child, I only saw my mother occasionally and on visits, so our relationship was strained by divorce. Water and going to work on the film with her and spending a certain amount of time with her was really our second chance," said Devyani, who is half-Jewish and half-Indian.

"Shooting Water is not a book about the making of the film in a technical sense. It's about the politics of South Asia, it's about cinema, it's about the odyssey to create this one film, but it's also about divorce and parent-child relations, and those are universal."

She was 19 when her mother invited her to work on the film as the third assistant camera-person, and although writing a book about her experiences on Water was the last thing on her mind at the time, the events that followed turned Devyani from a girl who loved to write into a published author.

Four years after the production had been shut down, Water, the third instalment of the Elements Trilogy after Fire and Earth, which examines the lives of widows in India in the late 1930s, started production again in a secret location in Sri Lanka.

It wasn't until Devyani consulted her journal entries that it occurred to her that she might be able to turn them into a book.

"The idea that this was an amazing piece of non-fiction was there, but only in the last year, year and a half did it came to the foreground," she said.

Although Devyani is at a point in her life when most 25-year-olds are still trying to decide what they want to do when they grow up, she has already dipped her hand into photojournalism, freelancing, cinema, non-fiction writing and has ambitions to write a travel book and a novel.

As much as Devyani wants to distance herself from her parents' accomplishments and establish herself as a writer and photographer in her own right, it is hard to deny that she was influenced by her father, who has always encouraged her to follow her own dreams, just as he always has.

Paul Saltzman grew up in Toronto, and was offered a job by the National Film Board of Canada in 1967 to be a researcher and a co-host of a youth public affairs television show after he returned from Mississippi where he was "doing civil rights work."

"I came back and someone offered me a job in television and I thought it sounded like fun and it was. That's kind of how my life has gone in a sense of serendipity," said Paul, who didn't begin making his own films until 1972.

Although Paul, the son of Percy Saltzman, the first weatherman on Canadian television, is best known for directing and producing films and television, he describes himself as a storyteller who is inspired by human courage.

"In a way I am a storyteller in part, which wasn't pre-planned. I found people in my life who gave me courage, and I started making documentary films about them. I didn't really realize what I was doing until I started winning awards and someone said, 'Why do you do the films you do?'

"And I remember I had to think about it, and I said, 'Well I make films about people who give me courage and I want to pass that along to others.' What has been a large part of my motivation is my own creative pleasure, but also passing along to others that which may be of benefit," Paul said.

Paul Saltzman and his daughter Devyani

His latest project, a photography book called The Beatles in India, which features pictures he took of the Beatles in 1967 when they stayed at Maharishi Mahesh Yogi's ashram in Rishikesh, India, wouldn't exist if not for Devyani, Paul said.

Paul was 23 when he went to India to do some soul-searching, but accidentally stumbled on the ashram where the Beatles went to meditate and produce some of their best music.

Paul stayed with them for a week, all the while taking pictures of John, Paul, George and Ringo, with their permission.

The pictures were stashed away for 30 years until Devyani remembered a childhood bedtime story about her father's encounter with the Beatles and urged her father to dig them up.

"I projected them in the family room and I remember what you said at the very end," Paul said to his daughter.

"You said, 'You know, Dad, they're really great, you should do something with them.' And that planted the seed."

Six years ago, he released the same photos in a book titled The Beatles in Rishikesh, which, he said, was poorly printed by the publishing company.

"I always wanted to do it right, and it grew into doing it in a collectors' form," Paul said of the new book.

While both Paul and Devyani have released books within the same year, Devyani said they are working in completely different media – one is non-fiction, the other a collection of photographs.

"I think it would be hard if you were coming out with a photography book and I was coming out with a photography book," Devyani told her father.

"I just think it's nice to have that space in terms of being different and expressing ourselves in different ways."

"I'm quite happy that we're both in the arts, yet in different arts," she added.

In a career that has spanned three decades, Paul has immersed himself in television, movies, photography and writing.

He owns his own production company called Sunrise Films Limited and doesn't show any signs of slowing down.

"I imagine I will do more writing, I imagine I will take more pictures, I imagine I will make more films, and I imagine I will continue to enjoy my daughter for a great many years."

Music and Jewish identity in postwar America

By NORMAN RAVVIN

Chronicles, Volume One*, by Bob Dylan, Simon and Schuster

The Mayor of MacDougal Street: A Memoir*, by Dave Van Ronk with Elijah Wald, Da Capo

The recent memoirs by Bob Dylan and Dave Van Ronk are surprisingly rich sources for recovering a sense of Jewish American life in the postwar years. Neither book addresses this subject directly. Van Ronk was not Jewish, and Dylan is famously evasive in the area of religious identity, yet both memoirs reveal, alongside their account of a life in music, how popular culture presented avenues of identification in America under Dwight D. Eisenhower, John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson.

Norman Ravvin

Van Ronk was little known outside the circles of folk aficionados, until Dylan's memoir Chronicles made the grand assertion that in "Greenwich Village, Van Ronk was king of the street, he reigned supreme." He died in 2002 before the work on his own memoir of the 1960s Greenwich Village scene was finished.

Completed by music writer Elijah Wald, The Mayor of MacDougal Street is a more traditional autobiography than Dylan's book, with its portrait of Van Ronk's early years in Queens, his musical apprenticeship and his role as a leader among young musicians and a link with earlier blues figures. Like Dylan, Van Ronk resists the vanguard role that others have claimed for him. He is an ever wary observer, dedicated to describing the way a young man learns his licks, to giving forgotten bluesmen their due and to offering a description of the transformation of the MacDougal Street scene where musicians from all over the country swapped old-time ballads, into a magnet for tourists and record agents.

Van Ronk's own background was Brooklyn Irish, but he displays an anthropologist's eye for the Jewish character of downtown New York culture. He was a dedicated socialist, and at times an anarchist. His organizing – whether for the Folksingers Guild or the Young People's Socialist League – was done amongst Jews.

Applying a sharp ethnographic eye, Van Ronk explains that "a lot of both the middle-class left-wingers and the workers back in the 1930s were first- or second-generation immigrants, and the folk revival served as a way for them to establish American roots. This was especially true for the Jews. The folk revivalists were at least 50 per cent Jewish, and they adopted the music as part of a process of assimilation to the Anglo-American tradition."

Van Ronk seems to miss a nice irony here. As the folk music scene allowed the children of immigrants to Americanize, it was also a project of recovery – a replacement of European folk culture with the blues-inflected expression of the black American south.

Still, Van Ronk's thesis goes a good distance toward describing both the uncanniness and the logic of a Jewish kid from Minnesota appearing on the scene as the natural inheritor of Woody Guthrie. Dylan quickly became the Greenwich Village scene's paramount figure – its renegade genius who rose above the crowd of youth who used the folk revival as a way "to establish American roots."

In Van Ronk's portrait, we find what may be the first reliable explanation of how Dylan came to sound like Dylan. Singing loudly, singing like a grizzled bluesman and singing, as Van Ronk puts it, like a "neo-ethnic," was what the hard core of young male folksingers did. It was de rigueur, too, to dress like "the scruffiest-looking fugitive from a cornfield."

One of Dylan and Van Ronk's early models, Ramblin' Jack Elliott, grew up Jewish as Elliott Andnopoz in Ocean Parkway, and was so well disguised as a "good-coin goyish cowboy" that when Dylan learned of Elliott's background, "he fell off his chair, he was rolling around on the floor, and it took him a couple of minutes to pull himself together and get up again… A lot of us had suspected that Bobby was Jewish, and after that we had no doubts."

The best approach is to read The Mayor of MacDougal Street first, followed by Dylan's stranger and, in ways, richer book. Chronicles frustrated some readers, although its reception has been largely positive. Reviewers repeated similar complaints: the lack of a linear narrative; the detailed attention to a relatively recent recording, Oh Mercy, with little said about earlier breakthrough recordings; the disinterest in discussing Christian evangelism and its relationship to Dylan's roots.

When read with care, however, Chronicles offers terrific flashes of personal revelation that reviewers neglected to focus on.

Dylan develops his memories along two separate narrative lines. Duluth, Minn., where he was born, and Hibbing, where he grew up, are repeatedly linked with the 14th-century arrival of Vikings, connecting the landscape with American prehistory and autochthony, as if the upper midwest is the cradle of everything that followed these events.

As well, this part of the Midwest is linked with the home of the blues, since it and Memphis stand at "opposite ends of the Mississippi River." Highway 61, he tells us, "the main thoroughfare of the country blues, begins about where I came from… Duluth to be exact."

By way of these motifs, Dylan constructs a myth of himself, and places himself on the American landscape as a quester after its most traditional music. But he does not hide the particularity of his own roots. His father was Duluth-born and raised. But Dylan writes, too, of a grandmother who had "come to America from Odessa… She was a dark lady, smoked a pipe… Her family was from Kagizman, a town in Turkey near the Armenian border, and the family name had been Kirghiz. My grandfather's parents had also come from that same area, where they had been mostly shoemakers and leatherworkers."

His father's polio kept him from army service during World War II, but Dylan recalls uncles – he names six but says there were more – who had "gone and come back alive… to the Philippines, Anzio, Sicily, North Africa, France and Belgium. They brought back mementos and keepsakes – a straw Japanese cigarette case, German bread bag… They returned to civilian life as if nothing ever happened, never said a word about what they did or what they saw."

It is this material – a memory of Kagizmani shoemakers and the silence of men who had come back from the war in Europe – that compelled Dylan toward what he calls a "parallel universe" with "archaic principles and values; one where actions and virtues were old style." Call it American folk music.

Norman Ravvin's fiction includes the novel, Lola by Night, and the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish. He is Chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Morgan Pressel granted full LPGA membership

CJN News Services

The LPGA has granted teen golf phenom Morgan Pressel full membership for the entire 2006 season. She will begin her first full pro season in February.

Pressel, 17, was informed of the decision in a phone call while she was on her way to high school classes in south Florida.

The Boca Raton, Fla., native said the news was "a dream come true."

Although she had tied for sixth at the LPGA qualifying tournament, earning her the right to play on the women's tour, LPGA rules barred her from playing as a LPGA member until she turns 18 in May.

Pressel could have played six times before then under sponsor's exemptions, but any money and points she would have earned would not have gone toward rookie of the year honours, the money list or eligibility for the LPGA playoffs.

Pressel said she planned to finish her last year of high school. Despite being absent from the classroom for more than 10 weeks in 2005, she maintained a 3.9 grade-point average, the Miami Herald reported.

Pressel played in seven LPGA events in 2005, never finishing lower than 25th and making the top five twice. She nearly won the U.S. Women's Open at Cherry Hills Country Club last June. She finished second only after Birdie Kim sunk a nearly impossible bunker shot at the 72nd hole.

Pressel won the U.S. Women's Amateur two months later and became the first player to sweep the five biggest events on the American Junior Golf Association circuit.

Pressel's uncle is Aaron Krickstein, the youngest player (16) to win on the ATP Tour. At 17, he became the youngest player to be ranked in the top 10.

Pressel was a star golfer at an early age. When she was nine she broke 80, at age 11 it was 70. When she was 12, she qualified for the U.S. Women's Open – the youngest player ever to do so.

Pressel received a second bit of good news recently. The Callaway Golf Company, which manufactures and sells golf clubs, balls and accessories, signed her to a multi-year contract to play with and endorse Callaway equipment.

Last November, she signed with IMG, the world's largest international sport management and marketing group.

Yeshiva U hoops legend a 'straight up' guy

NEW YORK — Bernard "Red" Sarachek, longtime coach of the Yeshiva University (YU) basketball team and a member of both the New York City Hall of Fame and the New York City Basketball Hall of Fame, died late last year in Deerfield Beach, Fla., after a lengthy illness. He was 93.

Obituary

For the past 15 years, Sarachek had lent his name to the most prestigious basketball tournament for Jewish high schools from across North America.

YU will host the Red Sarachek Invitational Basketball Tournament at its Manhattan campus from March 30 to April 3. The tournament will include 18 teams, among them Yeshivat Or Chaim (Toronto), the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Hebrew Academy of Montreal. In the past, Bialik High School of Montreal has also attended.

Renowned internationally as a coach of both coaches and players, Sarachek counted among his disciples some of the best-known coaches in the United States, including Lou Carnesecca, Jack Donohue and Red Holzman.

"He has taught more high school and college coaches in [the New York area] than anybody," said former St. John's University coach Carnesecca. "Red is the guru."

Sarachek coached the YU team from 1942 to 1943 and from 1945 to 1969.

One of Sarachek's players was Hamilton-born Stan Raphael, today a lawyer in Toronto.

Raphael attended YU from 1966 to 1968 but played for Sarachek only in his first year.

The memories of that experience are still vivid.

"I remember him as a tough American coach. He smoked a cigar during practice, and he'd throw a lit cigar at us if he was mad," Raphael said.

Raphael's previous experience playing high school basketball in Hamilton barely prepared him for the college game.

"He had a whole series of set plays. He was so organized," Raphael said.

"He was a real tough guy. He really knew basketball. It was like being in the army."

Sarachek, who "was tough on everybody," seemed to delight in picking on Raphael – for being Canadian.

Sarachek, Raphael recalled, used to tell him, "'I don't know why you're on the team. Canadians play hockey, not basketball.'"

Despite that gruffness, Sarachek helped Raphael find a part-time job to help him get through college. Raphael sold running shoes provided by Sarachek from his store.

Raphael would travel to high schools in Harlem to sell the shoes for $5 each. He'd earn a 50 cent commission from each sale. It was enough for pocket money, Raphael recalled.

Sarachek's ties to professional basketball go back to when the sport was in its infancy in the 1940s. At the time, Sarachek simultaneously coached the Scranton Miners of the American Basketball League and a team representing Herkimer, N.Y., in the New York State League. He led both teams to championships while at the same time coaching the YU team.

With Scranton in the late 1940s, the Bronx-born Sarachek broke the league's segregation rules by playing Dolly King, William "Pop" Gates and Eddie Younger at the same time. Pop Gates went on to a stellar pro career that led to international fame with the Harlem Globetrotters and eventual enshrinement in the NBA Hall of Fame.

Current YU coach Jon Halpert, in his 34th season as coach, played for Sarachek from 1962 to 1966. Halpert said the key thing to know about Sarachek was that he believed in the truth.

"If you made a bad play, you heard about it," Halpert said. "He did what he thought was right and he said what he thought was right. That was Red. That's how he approached all things. He had as many Italian friends as Jewish friends. As many Irish friends as Jewish friends. As many black friends as Jewish friends. As long as you were truthful and straight up, he liked you. There was no spin with Red."

A reminder of why

By MICHAEL GORDON

It was a remarkable headline, early in November – "Unanimous UN declaration of int'l Holocaust Day." I was in Israel with my fourth UJA medical mission, and we exalted in this further blow against Holocaust deniers.

We entered the new Yad Vashem. Its powerful and moving exhibits, along with the UN declaration, established that those whose lives were lost would always be remembered. I looked at the pictures and interviews of the elderly survivors and recalled the many Holocaust survivor patients I looked after during my years of practice at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The Senior Side of Life

I remember the first patient I saw for whom the implications of the Holocaust hit me in a way I had never experienced. My grandparents were Lithuanian pogrom survivors from the early 20th century, and therefore escaped the Holocaust. I recall, as a youngster, visiting a farm in the Catskills with my maternal grandmother who was an excellent singer. The hosts from her ancestral community celebrated the reunion with much eating and singing, and I vividly recall uncomprehendingly seeing numbers tattooed on the arms of all her friends.

The patient was telling me his medical history. When asked about his family history, he stopped and looked at me. "I do not know anything about my family's medical history. They all perished in the Holocaust, all 163 of them."

I turned from my notes and looked into this man's moistened eyes. "All of them died," I said, and he corrected me – "Were murdered."

I finished my examination, realizing that whatever discussions I might usually have with family members about care and planning for the future could not take place with this patient – he was alone. And yet, he had managed to continue with his life for 30 years since arriving from Poland as a camp survivor.

I have seen the results of the Holocaust in my patients, ranging from enormous strength and tenacity for life to being forever haunted and plagued by the experiences and memories.

As his Alzheimer's dementia progressed, one of my patients would awaken every night panicked with severe agitation and tell his wife, "They should have taken me." She believed this referred to the morning roll call in Auschwitz when two friends standing on either side of him were brutally removed for execution but he was spared, for no understandable reason.

In contrast, one of my patients who, as a young adult, survived alone for three years in the forests of Czechoslovakia, hiding and sleeping in caves, avoiding imminent capture and execution by the Nazis, was referred for possible cardiac bypass surgery. I read the letter from the cardiac surgeon estimating a surgical mortality risk of 30 per cent, which appeared too high to go ahead, and he asked, "Does that mean a 70 per cent chance of surviving?" I nodded yes.

"That sounds pretty good to me when, for three years, I had a 95 per cent chance of dying every day and managed to survive."

He was referred back to the surgeon and convinced her to operate, after explaining that the risk was personally acceptable to him. He had the operation, and two weeks after surgery, he was home in Baycrest Terrace.

The declaration that International Holocaust Memorial Day will be Jan. 27 and the experience at the new Yad Vashem reminded me of all the people I have seen over the years for whom the Holocaust played a clinically critical role. This profound life experience had to be recognized in order for proper understanding and medical treatment to be provided.

Epi on Education

Between dream and reality

I have a very vivid memory of my first arrival in Israel in 1965.

I came on a ZIM passenger liner that travelled from Marseilles to Haifa, which is much more romantic than my current arrivals by plane after sleepless nights. The night before my first arrival, however, was also sleepless, because a dream – soon to be realized – was keeping me up.

Seymour Epstein

That dream was composed of a surrealistic mixture of images of Israel from two sources: my day school education and my mother, aleha hashalom. The mythical Israel in my head and heart was made up of kibbutzim with bonfires and singing, ancient midrashim about the holiness of Jerusalem, snippets of Bialik's poetry, and songs my mother knew from the Ukraine that spoke of working and starving in Palestine.

Soon after I disembarked, I encountered a somewhat different reality. There were constant connections with the "dream Israel," some reinforcing, others negating. They included a Jerusalem divided and not always sacred, as well as having my tfillin stolen (by a Jewish thief, I assume); working on a kibbutz that was indeed better than the dream in many ways; and studying literature, language and history with such intensity that my new literacy overtook my old identity. What was black and white suddenly became a complex rainbow of ideas, thoughts and feelings.

I now appreciate with hindsight that what was really happening was that Yerushalayim shel Maalah was in dialectic with Yerushalayim shel Mata – that is, the heavenly Israel of my dreams was coming to grips with the earthly Israel of reality. One was not replacing the other, but rather each was in a struggle that neither would win nor lose. I needed to see the rules for royalty in Israel as portrayed in both the Bible and Maimonides juxtaposed with the political parties of the time and the Israeli version of democracy in order to appreciate how the dream and the reality need each other.

The healthy tension created by that Zionist dialectic was taught to me during my wondrous year in Israel in 1965-66. We need to find a way to renew the awareness of that tension and teach it to the next generation of Jews.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Finding wisdom at a bakery

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The bakery or the butcher. The fruit and vegetable kiosk, or the flower store. Which, generally, is the most enthralling? A lot of us would likely say the bakery. Why? The Torah says, "Not by bread alone will man live, but rather by all that comes from God" [Deuteronomy 8:3]. Maybe the allure of bread is that it's Godly.

URBAN WRITER

My niece, Dodi-Lee Hecht, worked at a local bakery off and on for the last four years while getting her degree in mathematics. I once read a compelling article in the New York Times about an elevator operator in Manhattan who had written three manuscripts. Dodi is like that. She is imaginative and inspired, both inside and outside the bakery.

"That's why I loved the job," she said. "It was exactly what I needed to offset what I got in an academic environment. – the part of life that happens in between the career."

Dodi said that at the bakery, she learned about both bread and human interaction. About bread, she says: "It is so simple – just flour, water and yeast – but unique. It has it's own brachah, and you can't snack on it, because you have to wash for it."

But, Dodi adds, "if bread were so simple, no bakery would be in business."

She has a point. Bread is special. The Zohar (the book of Jewish mysticism) talks about bread in great detail, defining at length the two types of bread eaten by the Children of Israel during the Exodus: the matzah, the bread from Malchut, the kingdom within, and then "the bread from heaven," the manna.

Dodi also learned about people and about our community during her time at the bakery. She worked behind the counter (a job that's dramatically different than that of the bakers, who have their own silent camaraderie), and she was nervous in the beginning that she would find out that people weren't considerate. "But it was nice to see the unexpected courtesies, and you get to see everyone almost equalized. Everyone needs bread," she said.

I told Dodi that one day, I'd like to be an invisible customer, able to see the behind-the-scenes stuff required to make sure the bakery runs well. Dodi said I'd learn that the owners of the place she worked, are "very warm without being gushy; no nonsense; inspire loyalty in all their staff and made a real effort to get to know me, when I was 19 and my uncertain future had me philosophizing myself into despair."

I'd see that this bakery couple love the Jewish People, the community and Israel, and that owning a bakery is like being a host, since you welcome people into your store as you would welcome them into your home. I would also discover that the counter managers – a woman from the Philippines and a man from Ethiopia – are up at 4 a.m. on Fridays working hard to get ready for the pre-Shabbat crowds. They understand the holiness of Shabbat.

I got a glimpse of a new world through Dodi's experiences. I realized Jewish bakeries have two personalities: one on Thursday afternoon and Fridays, and another on other weekdays. Dodi taught me that a patron's food list can tell you whether they're celebrating or in mourning, and that the line between the counter people and patrons sometimes gets blurred because of a potent relationship that develops around white bread, rye, whole wheat, multi-grain, pumpernickel, challah and sour dough bread.

Dodi says working in a bakery and selling bread is like learning a dance. You need to know its rhythm and the uniqueness of the product, and understand that at the end of the day, we truly do not live by bread alone.

Israeli politics go on without Sharon

Massive stroke fells PM

By DAN BARON
JTA

Israel is resigning itself to politics without Ariel Sharon. Shock gripped the Jewish state last week when Sharon was hospitalized with a massive stroke, turning to fears for the worst when he underwent repeated surgery under deep sedation.

But while doctors said early this week that they would try to bring the prime minister out of his induced coma, the prognosis that he would survive – but be forced to retire – took shape. Sharon's chief surgeon, Jose Cohen, put the chances of Sharon living at "very high."

"He is a very strong man, and he is getting the best care," the Jerusalem Post quoted Cohen as saying. "He will not continue to be prime minister, but maybe he will be able to understand and to speak."

As the prime minister lay in a post-operative coma, his temporary replacement, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, chaired the weekly cabinet meeting.

"We hope that the prime minister will recover, gain strength, and with God's help, will return to run the government of Israel and lead the State of Israel," Olmert said.

While noting that doctors' reports from Jerusalem's Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Center at Ein Kerem had given a "glimmer of hope" regarding Sharon's chances of recuperating, Olmert said matters of state were robust as ever.

"We will continue to fulfil Arik's will, and to run things as he wished," he said, using Sharon's nickname.

"Israeli democracy is strong, and all of the systems are working in a stable, serious and responsible manner. This is just as it should be, and how it shall continue."

With general elections looming on March 28, Olmert has his hands full.

Prayers for return to health

Editorial

The photo alongside this editorial says most of what needs to be said about Ariel Sharon at this hour, as he still fights for his life at Hadassah Ein Kerem Hospital in Jerusalem.

Turning the dream, finally, of a Jewish homeland for the Jewish people into a secure reality has been the pre-eminent devotion of Ariel Sharon's life.

The Israeli prime minister is standing amid the flowers on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem, at the recent opening of a museum in honour of the man for whom the mountain was given its modern name. Sharon is a sabra, a bearer, one generation later, of the profound, existential burden that Theodor Herzl placed upon his people more than a century ago.

Now that Sharon lies stricken in a hospital bed, his future uncertain, our prayers and hopes speed toward him that he may return to health and home.

The clay of Sharon's forceful personality was shaped with a double-edged stylus: the farm and the military. These have been the two significant and overwhelmingly formative influences in his life.

The News in Brief

CANADA

New Judges Named

TORONTO — Two Jewish lawyers were among three new judges sworn in last week by the Ontario Court of Justice. Criminal lawyer Melvyn Green and Crown lawyer Miriam Bloomefeld joined Queen's University law professor Gary Trotter on the court.

JNF to Fete Premier

WINNIPEG — The Jewish National Fund for Manitoba and Saskatchewan has named Manitoba's NDP premier, Gary Doer, as its 2006 Negev Dinner honoree. "Premier Doer is a strong supporter of Israel," incoming regional president Graham Dixon told JNF's annual meeting last month. Doer, premier since 1999, visited Israel in 2002 and spoke at the 2005 Negev Dinner.

WORLD

PM Punished: Pastor

NORFOLK, Va. — Rev. Pat Robertson said Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's latest stroke was God's punishment for dividing the Land of Israel. Speaking last Thursday on the 700 Club, Robertson said Sharon, who at the time was in an induced coma, and former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, assassinated in 1995, angered God by dividing Israel. "[Sharon] was dividing God's land," Robertson said. "And I would say, 'Woe unto any prime minister of Israel who takes a similar course to appease the EU, the United Nations or the United States of America.' God says, 'This land belongs to me. You better leave it alone.'"

Chavez Slurs Jews

CARACAS — The Simon Wiesenthal Center has written to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez demanding an apology for anti-Semitic comments he made last month. "The world offers riches to all. However, minorities such as the descendants of those who crucified Christ" have become "the owners of the riches of the world," the populist leader said Dec. 24 in a televised Christmas speech from a rehabilitation centre in the Venezuelan countryside.

Boycott Backed

OSLO — Norway's finance minister is backing her party's boycott of Israel. Kristin Halvorsen – who leads the Socialist Left Party, the minority partner in a new three-party governing coalition – caused outrage after telling a newspaper last week she backs the boycott and had stopped buying Israeli products herself. Foreign Minister Jonas Gahr Stoere, of the Labor Party, called a government-backed boycott of Israel "unthinkable." Last month, a municipality in central Norway launched a boycott of Israeli goods.

Palm Beach Almost As Jewish As Israel

WEST PALM BEACH — Palm Beach County, Fla., has a higher concentration of Jews than any other metropolitan area in the world outside Israel, a new study says.

The county's Jewish population is an estimated 255,000, meaning at least one in five of its 1.2 million residents is Jewish, according to the study.

The report by University of Miami researcher Ira Sheskin was released last week by the Jewish Federation of Palm Beach County, which covers the northern half of the county, and the Jewish Federation of South Palm Beach County, which serves Boca Raton and Delray Beach.

The study said Boynton Beach has emerged as "ground zero" of a Jewish population explosion. Since 1999, the suburb of 52,000 has seen its Jewish population jump by 63 per cent, while nearby Lake Worth has seen a 12 per cent increase, and Jewish households in the county's northern suburbs such as Palm Beach Gardens, North Palm Beach and Jupiter have grown by 45 per cent.

Method to Madness?

TEHRAN — Iran's president said his comments denying the Holocaust are part of a strategy to win over young Muslims. "Some in Iran and abroad thought we were making these speeches without a specific plan and policy, but we have been pursuing a deliberate strategy in this regard," Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told some young Islamic activists last week, the Iran Focus website said. The widely condemned comments have helped wake up Muslim youth, Ahmadinejad claims. He also said last week that Iran will push ahead with its nuclear research, and he wished death for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon as he lay ill in Israel.

Lobbyist Pleads Guilty

WASHINGTON — A prominent U.S. Jewish lobbyist pleaded guilty last week to two criminal charges related to his 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats in Florida. The plea suggests that Jack Abramoff, until last year Washington's pre-eminent Republican lobbyist, is ready to testify against a host of lawmakers, mostly Republican, on campaign finance improprieties. He's still under investigation in other cases, and he's alleged to have misused clients' money to fund some Jewish charities.

Toronto students help out victims of Katrina

Rebuilding houses in damaged areas

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's been nearly five months since Hurricane Katrina tore through the Gulf Coast, destroying homes, devastating cities and breaking up families, but Jewish students in Toronto haven't forgotten about its victims.

Twenty Torontonians, including two staff from Hillel of Greater Toronto, Tzedek Hillel director Devora Schwartz and Israel affairs programs co-ordinator Leemor Valin, joined about 150 students from schools across North America to participate in a Hillel-wide mission to help rebuild the devastated areas in Gulfport, Miss.

Michelle Lackie, director of Weinberg Tzedek Hillel, an international public service effort sponsored by Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, joined forces with the Minneapolis-based Nechama: Jewish Response to Disaster, and the United Jewish Communities to organize a trip that would give students the opportunity to lend a helping hand. Participants, some of whom left for the area on Jan. 1, will assist by rebuilding houses that were damaged by Hurricane Katrina, in partnership with the Westminster Presbyterian Church in Mississippi.

"The church has identified 50 or so houses that need to have the roof sealed and the windows fixed so families can move back in," Lackie said.

"We're helping people who can't afford to do this on their own. They're living in tents on their property or living in shelters."

Jewish students from the University of Toronto and York University, as well as a few Torontonians who go to school at the University of Western Ontario, University of Guelph and Seneca College, are part of the first group of about 60 students currently in Mississippi. They will be there until Jan. 8.

A second group of students will take over the day they leave and continue to work on damaged homes until Jan. 15.

Schwartz said the response to the program was so amazing, that some students have to wait until the next trip to participate because there were not enough spots to accommodate the demand.

She said that when she first returned to work last September, many students expressed a desire to help and were looking for ways to assist the needy.

Attempts were being made to raise money and awareness, she said, but "many students had an interest in doing and seeing for themselves."

Lackie agreed that those who signed on were eager to jump in and help from the start.

"Everyone is really excited. They just want to get there and help," she said, two days before the first group left.

Each student paid $125 US, excluding transportation, to be a part of the team and will spend a week at the church, sleeping in sleeping bags on the floor.

"Tikkun olam [repairing the world] is a powerful Jewish belief that extends to helping not only Jews, but people all over the entire world," Schwartz said.

"We're doing this because tzedek is a strong Jewish value and it is important that we help other people when the opportunity to do so is there," Lackie added.

While a number of students will be going to the affected areas to help, Paul Hertz and Brandon Desyatnik of Eta Pi, the York chapter of the Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi, will be doing their part at home to raise money for the victims of the hurricane.

On Jan. 22, Eta Pi will host a steak-a-thon in an attempt to raise money.

"It works in the same way that a walk-a-thon would," said Hertz, the chapter's president. "People are supposed to raise money through pledges, and the goal is to eat a very large steak.

"At first this started out as a joke, but we realized that if a lot of people got involved, we could raise a lot of money."

To understand Sharon better

From the editor's desk

There were many horrible moments late last week when it seemed we would be writing an obituary for the man rather than for his political career. But as of this writing, thank God, it appears the Israeli prime minister will survive the massive cranial hemorrhaging that he suffered last Wednesday night and the three subsequent surgeries.

Should the prime minister arise from his dire medical condition, no one yet knows the extent of impairment he will face.

All we know is that whatever the physical condition facing Ariel Sharon upon his much hoped-for eventual release from hospital, he will confront its challenges with the same steely singularity of purpose that has been his lifelong, trademark approach to overcoming all difficulty and travail.

Some years ago, when the accompanying photo of Sharon carrying the lamb upon his shoulders was first published, satirists and political cartoonists delighted. The image was a rich vein into which they repeatedly dipped their mischievous pens. But there is a great deal more in the image than simply the ore of satire.

It captures a sense of the man as protector of a flock. He finds the lost lamb, indeed rejoices in finding it, retrieves it and brings it to safety.

It is Sharon's self-image – protector of his people – that has been one of the key motivational factors of his life from his earliest days.

I once heard Sharon speak of the battle for Latrun in which he fought as a commanding officer in the Alexandroni Brigade of the fledgling army of the nascent state of Israel.

Latrun was of vital strategic importance. On the westernmost edges of the foothills of Judea, where the Ayalon Valley lies wide and open, it overlooked the approaches to Jerusalem.

Jordanian forces were entrenched in the fortress police station built by the British during the mandate that dominated the valley. The Arab forces controlled the roads and had blocked all supplies from reaching Jerusalem. The city and its Jews faced starvation.

The 20-year-old Arik Sharon and countless other soldiers, among whom were refugees who had only recently arrived from the internment camps from Cyprus, were ordered to capture the fortress police station, open the road to Jerusalem and break the siege upon the Jewish capital.

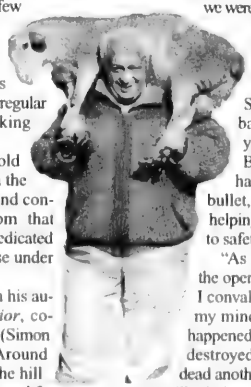
The battle was long, hard and bloody, but futile. Sharon was wounded in the fighting. And worse, as the fighting proceeded badly, he and his few men were left to their own devices on the battlefield, having to face the regular Jordanian fighting forces in front of them and the irregular local Arab fighters stalking them from the rear.

That experience, he told us, being "left behind on the field," seared his heart and consciousness forever. From that moment on, he said, he dedicated his life to protecting those under his care.

He wrote about this in his autobiography titled Warrior, co-written by David Chanoff (Simon and Schuster, 1989). "Around noon the Jordanians on the hill intensified their fire, the usual forerunner of another assault. Raising myself up to see what was happening, I felt something thud into my belly, knocking me back. I heard my mouth say, 'Imah' (mother), and the instant it was out I glanced around to see if anybody had heard. Already blood was seeping through my shirt and from my shorts, where another wound in my thigh had appeared as if by magic. I lay down, still lucid, but feeling my strength ebbing away.

"While I lay there, two of the 'older' men in the platoon crawled up to me, both of them British army veterans in their early 20s. Their eyes looked vacant. 'Arik,' one of them asked, 'how are you going to get us out of this?' I stared at them for a moment, then said sharply, 'Look, I've gotten you out of a lot of tight places before. I'll get you out of this too. Just get back and do what I told you…'

"We were alone on the field. The other units had been ordered back. That was what the artillery fire had been for, to cover the retreat. We had not seen them as they pulled out in back of us, and they had not known we were still here, and still alive."



Crawling on hands and knees from one rocky terrace to another, his wounds oozing blood, Sharon survived the battle for Latrun. A 16-year-old soldier, Yakov Bogin, whose lower jaw had been shattered by a bullet, saved Sharon's life by helping to drag and carry him to safety.

"As I waited for my turn in the operating room and then as I convalesced, I could not tear my mind away from what had happened. My platoon had been destroyed. Out of 35, 15 were dead another 11 wounded. Others were still missing. I knew the news would hit Kfar Malal, Kfar Saba and Magdiel like a plague."

As these words are being written, Ariel Sharon is fighting for his life again. But this time, he has not been left behind. The efforts to save him have been heroic, as befitting the man who left no lamb lost.

Student group makes Darfur an election issue

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A student group with roots in the Jewish community has launched an election advocacy campaign to make good on the post-Holocaust dictum, "Never again."

STAND Canada's "a vote for Darfur" campaign is aimed at making the ongoing genocide in Sudan an election issue, said STAND spokesperson Jonathan Laski.

Election 2006

At the midpoint of the 2005-06 campaign, the question of Darfur has barely registered among the candidates and major parties vying for office. The campaign has focused on domestic issues and some foreign policy matters, "but Darfur sets a tone for the Canadian moral character," Laski, one of STAND's national directors, said.

Darfur is a region in western Sudan that has been in conflict for almost three years. In that span, roving "janjaweed" militias, supported by the government in Khartoum, have killed as many as 400,000 black residents of Darfur and made millions more refugees. Canada has expended some political and diplomatic capital to support an African Union (AU) intervention force, but the 7,000-strong military unit has not been able to protect the refugees. Efforts to provide logistical support have been blocked by the Arab government in Khartoum.

STAND, an acronym for Students Taking Action Now: Darfur, has launched a two-part campaign to create support for a stronger Canadian effort. At the centre of the campaign is STAND's website, www.standcanada.org. In the first part of its campaign, visitors to the site will be asked to complete a short survey on their knowledge of the situation in Darfur. They will be asked to input their postal codes and the data will be compiled in a way to show candidates that voters in their ridings are interested in Darfur.

As part of stage two, candidates and party headquarters have been sent a short survey soliciting their knowledge and views on Darfur as well as their interest in joining a proposed parliamentary committee, if elected. Laski hopes that after the Jan. 23 election, 30 to 40 members of Parliment who feel strongly on Darfur will create an all-party parliamentary caucus and press the federal government to take a leadership role behind an international effort to address the crisis.

Survey results will be posted online so "voters can judge candidates on Darfur," Laski said.

Laski hopes voters will consider a candidate's position on Darfur when casting their ballots.

"It's literally about doing the right thing," he said.

Laski, who attended a Jewish day school, said he learned from a young age that "the Holocaust is not supposed to happen again." He believes "the Jewish community has an extra responsibility because we were the victims of the Holocaust. But Canadians in general, with our record of peacekeeping and peace-making, have a history of stepping in and saving lives."

So far, Canada's diplomatic efforts have focused on raising the issue in international forums. It has sent a handful of support troops to the region as well as armoured personnel carriers (they are stuck in Senegal), and it pledged $380 million (since 2000) for Darfur refugees and the AU military force. It also appointed an advisory team that includes Senator Roméo Dallaire, former head of United Nation forces in Rwanda, and the prime minister has named Senator Mobina Jaffer as his special envoy for peace in Sudan.

However, the international political will to intervene in Darfur appears to be weak. In fact, the AU, whose troops are supposed to provided security for the Darfur refugees, is scheduled to hold a summit meeting in Khartoum later this month. The move is seen as undercutting any condemnation of the Khartoum regime's genocidal policies. What's more, The New Republic, an American current affairs magazine, reported chairmanship of the AU traditionally goes to the most recent summit host. That means Sudanese President Omar el-Bashir will likely head the organization that is supposed to end the genocide backed by his government.

The New Republic also reported that the Arab League will hold its summit in Khartoum in March, further giving Sudan's regime diplomatic cover. In the United Nations, Algeria, Russia and China have blocked efforts to impose sanctions on Sudan.

Laski said if support for the AU force does not lead to an end to the genocide, "Canada and others should look at other levers of force in a multilateral format."

STAND Canada, which has a mailing list of 2,800 people, mostly students, was formed one year ago following a conference of National Jewish Campus Life. It is active on nine campuses across Canada and today only a little more than half of its active members are Jewish, Laski said.

Canadian Jewish Congress and Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS) are two other organizations with roots in the Jewish community that have been lobbying the Canadian government on the issue of Darfur.

Some fraternity brothers affected by storm

To take part in the challenge, where participants will eat a 72-ounce steak donated by a restaurant in Richmond Hill, each participant has to raise a minimum of $75.

Hertz hopes that at least 20 people will attempt the feat, clogging their arteries in the name of tikkun olam.

Hertz said he and Desyatnik were inspired to raise money for the needy in New Orleans because some of their fraternity brothers in the area were affected by the storm.

"We felt we had a personal connection to it and we wanted to help."

Proceeds from this event will go to the Alpha Epsilon Pi Foundation in Indianapolis, Indiana, and from there, the international body will decide which organization the money will go to.

French businesses operate call centres in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ron Machol has two words for potential olim who are worried about making a living in Israel – corporate aliyah.

As development director of Leavi, a non-profit organization that helps immigrants integrate and find employment in Israel, Machol encourages people to move their business with them.

Leavi was started about three years ago by Yossef Zarka, who moved his pharmaceutical company to Israel 10 years ago.

"I lost a cousin in the Passover 2002 bombing of a seder at the Park Hotel in Netanya, and this event made me realize that I had to make a change in my life, and do something that would help my people," said Zarka in a Leavi brochure.

Zarka knew there were thousands like him in France who, due to rising anti-Semitism in the country, wanted to live in Israel but were concerned about the 11 per cent unemployment rate.

Along with a team, he audited various types of businesses and realized that many could be outsourced easily. "These were businesses in which people could telecommute or operate a call centre," said Machol, in Toronto recently to promote the organization and attend the North American launch in New York City.

"In the past three years, he has helped about 40 people move their businesses from France to Israel. When clients call the business in Israel, they call a local France number and speak to a French person, so clients don't know there has been any change.

"These 40 businesses employ about 400 French olim, so not only have the owners made aliyah, they have created new jobs for others."

With the anti-Semitism in France, he says, "it would be a shame for people who want to live in Israel to remain in France because they're concerned about [their ability to make] a living. We want them to be confident they're going to make it."

When olim have moved to Israel with their businesses, says Machol, Leavi is there to help with housing and employment issues.

"We have lawyers and accountants who can answer any tax questions that arise because of the move, and we'll help create a business and marketing plan. We can also manage relocation logistical details, explore financing options and recruit employees.

"We're immigrant friendly, and we foster the environment to help them succeed. Failed businesses can lead to failed aliyah, and we want people to avoid that."

Ron Machol

North American businesses can be as successful in Israel as the French businesses, he says. "They'll create jobs for English-speaking olim."

Sharon was born in 1928 on Kfar Malal, a moshav northeast of Tel Aviv, in the Sharon coastal plain. Ploughing long days alongside his stubborn father, he learned to be indefatigable, never to bow his head at the long road ahead, never to surrender to the apparent insurmountability of the problems at hand.

As a commander of troops, he learned, as do all superb leaders, to be pragmatic and innovative, that the theory of battle must always bend to the conditions of battle on the field. Fixed, ideological, templated responses, he understood from fighting in war, can bring disaster when the reality does not suit the template. And thus, after seeing two entire generations of Palestinians since 1948 raised by their leaders only upon visions of displacing the Jews and destroying the Jewish state, Sharon came to change his mind about the way to resolve the conflict with the Palestinians: unilateral disengagement. He announced his plan in December 2003.

"We wish to speedily advance implementation of the road map toward quiet and a genuine peace… However, if, in a few months, the Palestinians still continue to disregard their part in implementing the road map, then Israel will initiate the unilateral security step of disengagement from the Palestinians.

"The purpose of the disengagement plan is to reduce terror as much as possible and grant Israeli citizens the maximum level of security. The process of disengagement will lead to an improvement in the quality of life and will help strengthen the Israeli economy… and relieve the pressure on the IDF and security forces in fulfilling the difficult tasks they are faced with. The disengagement plan is meant to grant maximum security and minimize friction between Israelis and Palestinians.

"We are interested in conducting direct negotiations, but do not intend to hold Israeli society hostage in the hands of the Palestinians… we will not wait for them indefinitely."

And he had the courage to begin implementing unilateral disengagement starting from Gaza last summer. Some Israelis vilified him for doing so. The vast majority approved. And that majority still does so today.

In reflecting upon Israel's future some 15 years ago, Sharon wrote: "We are, after all, a people with almost 4,000 years of history linking one generation to the next, a people who despite everything have been able to overcome whatever was inflicted on us… So when I consider how hard it looks now, I think back to when I was a child, working with my father on that arid slope of land, walking behind him to plant the seeds in the earth he had turned with his hoe. When I felt too exhausted to go on, he would stop for a moment to look backwards to see how much we had already done. And that would always give me heart for what remained."

The work of securing Israel's future, if not yet actually finding a true peace, is not finished. Given the intractability and irrationality of the hatred from some of our foes, Israel and the Jewish people at times feel exhausted. But, as Ariel Sharon would point out for us if he could today, we must not succumb to that exhaustion. Rather, we must all take heart from the seeds that have already been planted, and in no small measure by Ariel Sharon himself.

May God grant him speedy and full recovery.

Discrimination in education funding

For better or worse, Canada is now in the midst of a winter federal election campaign. Now is, therefore, the opportune time for members of our Canadian Jewish community to engage with federal politicians about issues of key concern to the community.

The importance of Canada's taking a fair and balanced approach to issues relating to Israel and the Middle East is one such issue. A lesser-known federal election issue that directly affects our community is Canada's continuing violation of the United Nations human rights treaty, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), by failing to provide a remedy for discrimination against Jews and other religious minorities in education funding in Ontario.

In Ontario, 93 per cent of the children attending faith-based schools are fully funded. The other seven per cent get nothing, solely because they are not Catholic. The UN Human Rights Committee ruled in the 1999 Waldman case that this discrimination violates international human rights law.

This discrimination is both a federal and provincial issue. In Canada, education is provincial, while compliance with international treaties is squarely a federal responsibility. The Canadian government has an obligation under the ICCPR to provide an effective remedy if Ontario continues to fail to eliminate this discrimination.

On Nov. 2, 2005, after six years of inaction of the federal government, the UN officially criticized Canada for its failure to comply.

When the politicians trudge through the snow to solicit our support, let's be sure to ask them what they will do to ensure that Canada complies with its treaty obligation to provide a remedy for this discrimination. After all, if we don't stand up for ourselves, who will?

Magen David Adom's emblem

Magen David Adom (MDA) in Israel has not relinquished its emblem in order to join the International Movement of the Red Cross ("MDA set to join Red Cross," CJN, Dec. 15).

The State of Israel, which signed the Geneva Conventions, as did 192 other countries, had to establish an organization based on the principles of the Red Cross movement. Israel recognized the Magen David Adom organization as its national society in humanitarian activities, the equivalent of a Red Cross national society.

In 1949, the MDA applied to join the international Red Cross without relinquishing its emblem and was rejected. Over the past 50-plus years, the MDA would have been recognized by the international Red Cross if it had renounced its emblem.

So what is different now? One hundred and ninety-two states met recently and accepted a third emblem – a crystal. (The other two are the red cross and red crescent emblems). The diamond-shaped red crystal emblem is meant to protect medical teams in religious conflicts. It has been decided that a red Star of David inside a red crystal is a legitimate emblem that can be used inside the borders of Israel and elsewhere in the world.

The decision to recognize the right of the MDA to bear its emblem cannot be interpreted as an Israeli capitulation.

Arnold Rosner
National Executive Director

Modern Orthodox minyanim

What makes a prayer service Orthodox ("Thinking outside of the ortho-box," CJN, Jan. 5)? Is it the assumed commonality of Orthodox belief and practice among the participants? Is it the liturgy? Is it not counting women in the minyan and/or allowing them to participate? Is it the mechitzah, the physical and psychological barrier that traditionally distinguishes Orthodoxy from all other movements?

Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary, wrote that a conundrum of modern Orthodoxy was in allowing women equal access to the beit midrash but not the beit knesset. That has clearly changed over the years.

A select number of bold and creative modern Orthodox minyanim in Israel and North America have taken steps based on tshuvot written from within their own communities that are similar to some tshuvot written in quarters outside of their communities. Except for separate seating, which I assume is upheld at the "Toronto Minyan," this new service sounds the same as services such as Beth Tzedec Congregation's Little Minyan, a Conservative, lay-led participatory service where women are not counted in the minyan and do not lead Shacharit or Musaf, but may lead Psukei D'zimrah and the Torah service, as well as read Torah, receive aliyot and deliver divrei Torah. The service has lots of ruach and lots of singing.

The second important question regarding the minyan is, "Where is it?" Wherever it was last week, it will hopefully need a larger space in the weeks to come.

Lorne M. Hanick
Ritual Director
Beth Tzedec Congregation

Perspectives

A Jewish giant

By URI DAN
The Jerusalem Post

The cries of rejoicing among the Palestinian terrorist organizations and in the Arab and Muslim countries that support them at the news of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's critical condition are a bad sign. More than any other Israeli leader, and for more years than anyone else in Israel, Sharon has served not only as a symbol of Israel's security, but he has also become a deterrent factor in the face of Arab threats.

That is why the moment this symbol collapsed in Jerusalem's Hadassah University Medical Center is being taken by Israel's Arab enemies as a sign of Israel's weakening, a weakening that represents an invitation to step up hostilities. Consequently, not only is the moribund peace process close to death, but the ominous shadow of the threat of terrorist attacks and war is growing.

Sharon's collapse will create an unprecedented leadership and security vacuum, more than the demise of any other prime minister. His loss is a veritable natural disaster, a leadership and security catastrophe of colossal proportions. There is good reason why he became the most popular prime minister Israel has ever had.

I say this because I stood at Sharon's side on his many military, political and diplomatic battlefields – starting the moment he became the commander of the only paratrooper commando regiment at the time, number 890, in 1954, when our close relationship and friendship, which has lasted more than 50 years, began.

Since that time, Sharon has been a key figure – as an Israel Defence Forces officer and as a minister in Israel's governments – in all the wars against the Arabs. Everywhere he acted, he attained a decisive victory over the Arab enemy, from the reprisal attacks against Palestinian terrorism in the 1950s, to crossing the Suez Canal in 1973, to the eviction of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat from Beirut in 1982.

As prime minister, he efficiently eliminated Arafat's suicide-bomber factory and lived to see Arafat dead and buried. Sharon related to him as "the greatest murderer of Jews since World War II." No Arab bullet, mortar shell, tank or plane ever managed to deter Sharon.

At the same time, he contributed to the establishment of stable and peaceful ties with Egypt and Jordan, and was willing to do more than any other Israeli leader to reach a settlement with the Palestinians. However, they once again missed the opportunity. For many years to come, they will not find facing them an Israeli leader capable of building up a peaceful coexistence between the two nations – unless Sharon rises from his sickbed.

The spirit of madness that has overtaken the terrorist organizations already views Sharon's removal from the scene as a general collapse of Israel's wall of security, and as an invitation to continued aggression.

Only Sharon, with his great love for Jerusalem, could have taken my advice to go up to the Temple Mount on Sept. 28, 2000, to challenge the attempt by then prime minister Ehud Barak to allow Arafat a foothold in the site most holy to Jews.

On the blackest day in Sharon's public career, in February 1983, when he was thrown out of the Defence Ministry after the Kahan Commission imputed him with indirect responsibility for the Sabra and Shatila massacre, I stood up and said: "Those who don't want to see Sharon as defense minister will get him one day as prime minister." In those days, the Israeli media and politicians carried out a political lynching of Sharon, determining that his political career was over.

My friend did not believe my forecast and asked why I said what I did. I explained to him that his removal from the Defence Ministry served as a signal to Israel's enemies that their most dangerous opponent had been thrown off the Israeli wall – and that that would bring war in time. And when the war came, the Jews would turn to him to save them. I added that I hoped I would be wrong, "but because I have worked with you in the Defence Ministry, I know just how rotten our political and security establishments are."

And indeed, the first intifadah came in 1987-1992, and it was followed by the first suicide attacks in 1996. During that time, there was no one else of Sharon's caliber among Israel's security leadership. He always excelled at taking responsibility for the most daring campaigns and operations, meticulously planned down to the smallest detail, with himself making the most difficult decisions.

That is how Sharon was from the time I first met him: standing on the military or political battlefield, whether with a tank or a bulldozer, always managing the campaign with astonishing cool-headed control.

The collapse of the man no enemy bullet could defeat, and in the finest of hospitals in Jerusalem, the Jerusalem that Sharon so loved and never intended to divide, has laid bare the true tragedy of Jews in Israel and the world – that for the time being, no leader able to enter the shoes of the Jewish Gulliver, Ariel Sharon, can be seen on the horizon.

After Sharon...

By DAVID HOROVITZ

It was not so many years ago that he was a national and international pariah, barred from ministerial office, reviled and spent. Yet as the full extent of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's incapacitation became plain, it was already clear that Israel is a changed and uncertain country without him at its helm, and that many Israelis feel thoroughly bereft without his massive, overwhelming presence.

His convictions altered utterly in recent years. The architect and advocate of Jewish settlement in territories we captured in the 1967 war became the only prime minister to forcibly dismantle long-established communities there; former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin never did that. But if politicians changing their spots is commonplace, what was unique about Sharon was the assurance he managed to exude that his new convictions were the sensible ones, and never mind what he had advocated before.

Sharon was on the brink of making history in Israel and winning three successive elections not by following a consistent political path. Anything but. He was striding to victory because, unlike any of his rivals, ordinary men and women with ordinary frailties and flaws, he had persuaded Israelis that he was of a different league, a political superman, immune to the limitations of other mortals. He was by no means universally admired, but he had a vast middle ground of confused Israelis wanting to believe that he knew what he was doing – that he, and only he, could steer the country to security and tranquility.

He achieved this following despite never fully detailing the course he was pursuing; indeed, that very vagueness was one of the secrets of his popularity. Trust me, the implicit message ran. Keep me in power, and everything will be all right.

And the Israeli public was ready to do so – notwithstanding that history of zigzagging, and more. By rights, he should have alienated just about every voter by now – the left by invading Lebanon, the right by leaving Gaza, the environmentalists by throwing the bulldozers at every housing problem, not to mention most everyone who expects standards of integrity from their leaders by allegedly playing fast and loose with campaign finance laws and embroiling himself in a series of unsavoury financial and influence-trading escapades.

Despite all that, more Israelis were backing him than any of his rivals – a reflection not only of the power and resonance of Sharon's personality, but of the perceived paucity of the alternatives.

Had he specified exactly what policies he intended to follow, come cleaner with the electorate, he would have been doing our democracy a service and he would, of course, have left far less of a vacuum now. He would also have dented that extraordinary perception, so widely felt, of his own indispensability.

But no man is indispensable. And no man can forever defy those mortal limitations – no matter how lightly he may shrug off the unavoidable toll of advancing years, or dismiss the particular strains of an unhealthy lifestyle and eating habits, or appear so easily to shoulder the uniquely onerous burden of leading embattled Israel.

Sharon's self-declared personal ambition to set Israel's permanent borders will not be realized now. Time has run out on that dream. History turned too slowly for him.

And as is always the way, the spotlight now moves on, and the question of Sharon's abiding influence hinges on what happens inside the vehicle, Kadima, a political party that he had assembled and tailored to his personal political contours.

Though Kadima was all too plainly Sharon's party, it has a logic that potentially survives him.

Amir Peretz heads a Labor party that overflows with ex-security chiefs. But while both his desire to alleviate economic inequalities in Israel and his positions on peacemaking will bring him some support, his own inexperience in defense-related issues, indeed his lack of any ministerial-level experience, limit his appeal.

The Likud party, meanwhile, has resolved its internal conflict and returned to some of its traditional positions under new-old leader Binyamin Netanyahu.

Many longtime supporters will have sighed with relief that Sharon's departure and Netanyahu's succession had put an end to the aberration of the past two years, when a party dedicated to thwarting the establishment of a Palestinian state west of the Jordan River was led by a prime minister with the opposite intent. But others, who had embraced what they saw as Sharon's pragmatism, will have been alienated.

Between those Labor and Likud poles, the same electorate that was so masterfully wooed by Sharon now waits and worries.

The cynics derided Kadima members Ehud Olmert, Tzipi Livni, Shimon Peres, Haim Ramon and Tzahi Hanegbi as opportunists united only by their sense that Ariel Sharon represented their best ticket to continued political power and influence. A descent into bickering over the succession of the leadership of the party, replete with the kind of personal mudslinging that Sharon had sought to nip in the bud, will vindicate those critics and destroy Kadima electorally. Not so, however, a consensual organization of the Knesset slate, championing the platform Kadima's members say has long been taking shape.

The electorate will tolerate far less from other Kadima leaders of the calibrated vagueness they forgave in Sharon. At the same time, the party will necessarily lose support the more clearly it sets out its positions. But there is, nonetheless, a wide swath of central ground that Sharon bestrode and that Kadima could still occupy if it were to try to derive positive momentum from his decline.

His rivals will seek to prevent Kadima's flourishing now. Will the fact that the prime minister so dominated that nascent party now doom it? Or will his colleagues demonstrate that there is life for Ariel Sharon's party, and his vaguely defined vision, without Ariel Sharon.

We've never had it so good

Jews are out of the ghetto. Though that has increased the threat of assimilation, the benefits greatly outweigh the dangers. There are at least three reasons why I unashamedly celebrate this new reality.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

I am a Zionist. In addition to fostering unconditional love for the people and the land of Israel in the light of Jewish sovereignty, Zionism has shown us that Jews need never again be victims.

Ironically, those who today, out of alleged love of Zion, see Israel as a Jewish ghetto surrounded by millions of potential assassins, deny the thrust and the achievements of Zionism. Their professed love of the Jewish state is stifling and could become a menacing self-fulfilling prophecy.

Jews today have no reason to see themselves as poor ghetto dwellers. Israel is proof that Jews can look after themselves as a sovereign people. Israelis seem to doubt that Diaspora Jews recognize this. Therefore, say in Canada, Israelis tend to have more in common with non-Jews than with Jews and are reluctant to be part of the Jewish community.

As well as being a Zionist, I am a Reform Jew. In addition to teaching me to view Judaism historically and to interpret its sources in the spirit of a faith that is open to the world and responsive to the call of God, Reform Judaism, like Zionism, has persuaded me that Jews no longer need to see themselves as victims. Though full integration has taken its time, the results are unmistakable. Reform Judaism is the product of Jewish emancipation and telling evidence of its success.

I also teach Judaism. In addition to being privileged to impart Torah and help Jews to live by its precepts, I have come to realize that a ghetto mentality deters many young people from identifying as Jews.

Whereas their parents and grandparents may have been moved to commitment and solidarity by being reminded that the world is hostile to Jews, the young are often put off by this message. They don't see themselves as children of the ghetto and respond best to positive affirmations of Judaism.

That is why I keep away from organizations that put the fear of anti-Semitism, including its anti-Zionist incarnation, at the centre of the Jewish agenda. Even if such fear commands short-term loyalty, it sows long-term seeds of disaffection. Young Jews want to celebrate Judaism, not to fight its enemies.

This doesn't mean that anti-Semitism should not be confronted or that the many dangers to Israel should be minimized. But we must encounter our enemies with confidence and determination, not sow panic in our own ranks.

We must accept the historic truth that Jews have never had it so good and permit ourselves to confidently celebrate freedom, equality and sovereignty.

Outward Bound canoe trip a learning experience

By MATTHEW POTTENS

With summertime approaching, a vast array of opportunities surface for students across the world. In 2002, I realized the perfect way to attain my desire for fun, change, and a way to strengthen my sense of self over the summer – through a physical and rewarding activity, also known as canoe tripping.

Matthew Pottens in Halifax

The summer of 2002, I survived a 21- day canoe trip in the wilderness surrounding Thunder Bay, Ont., with Outward Bound Canada. It was the most challenging experience of my life, and by far the most rewarding.

Throughout the months approaching July, the upcoming summer had seemed bleak. Heavy violence in Israel prevented Biluim Israel, the final phase of Canadian Young Judaea's leadership training programs, from happening, and I was left with a tough decision to make. With some convincing from my mom, and some heavy research, it seemed like Outward Bound would be a positive experience for a confused 17-year-old.

The day arrived, and I was on an airplane heading toward the beautiful Thunder Bay area. After arriving and meeting and greeting, we were off to the first campsite. As if the uncertainty and the new faces weren't enough to handle, on the way to the campsite we had to stop twice to allow two monstrous black bears and their cubs to pass by the ancient dirt road we travelled on. We finally arrived and got more acquainted with one another. We came from different parts of the world, including Canada (Toronto, Aurora, Ont., Calgary), France, Austria and the United States (Pittsburgh).

After a day of getting to know one another, we set off for the Outward Bound main camp. We needed to pack food, get equipment, and learn some basic skills before going on our two-week, non-stop canoe trip. After two long days of paddling, we arrived at the main camp, got what we needed and set out to overcome the challenges of the wilderness.

The first day of the adventure proved to be the toughest. We were up before the sun and we were charged like nine-volt batteries. We had no idea what were getting into.

After a nice paddle, we arrived at our first real portage. It was only about two kilometres long, which would normally take a group about an hour. But when a vast wilderness region meets up with a forest fire, what was a portage, now was a pile of trees that were ripped out of the ground, broken into smaller trees, and lying one on top of another to form a massive wall – and preventing anyone from getting in or out.

We entered, saws in hand, and began destroying this beast of a portage. We started at 9 a.m., and after nine hours of gruelling physical work, which included sawing and pulling canoes through, under and over trees, we decided that our only option was to sleep inside of the beast. We set up camp on the flattest possible ground, devoured some jelly sandwiches and called it a night. The next morning we got an early jump and made it through the portage by lunchtime. A projected couple hours of work had turned into a day and a half of frustration, discouragement, physical pain and exhaustion. Yet, we survived, and I am glad I experienced it. Besides, what doesn't kill me only makes me stronger.

This is merely a fraction of what an Outward Bound experience offers. In a future article, I'd love to tell you all about my solo experience on Outward Bound. On a solo trip, you are left alone in the wilderness for two nights and three days, with little food, a pen and a journal to write in. There is much more to Outward Bound than just physical challenges. It's about dealing with the unknown. It's about meeting challenges. And it's about learning – learning about yourself, about others, about the environment, and most of all, about your potential.

The holiday season

After I handed in the last assignment of the term, a feeling of giddy euphoria washed over me. I had conquered this term. It was over. An entire two weeks of vacation were before me and no school-related responsibilities hung over me, a stark contrast to the last sleepless days, hunched over my drafting table, feverishly trying to finish assignments while fighting off the need to sleep. My plans for the vacation? Sleep. Lots of sleep.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

After two days doing nothing but sleeping, eating junk food and watching television I realized that I was bored. This is not to put down those activities – sleeping is quite enjoyable, I have no problem eating, and television remains one of my most effortless "activities." But in my boredom, I began doing two of these activities at the same time, and although television and eating worked fine, television and sleeping proved rather difficult.

As the boredom grew, I sought something to do and turned to the many fine shopping establishments available. You are certainly aware that the winter vacation period is also the holiday season, and it is well-known that during this season, normally sane people may become psychotic, present-buying machines, like some kind of capitalistic consumer version of the Terminator.

The various religions that celebrate holidays at this time, including Christmas, Chanukah and Kwanza, encourage people to give gifts, and with great fervour, many adherents of these religions go out to buy their gifts. People who don't celebrate these holidays have to buy gifts simply because someone bought them a gift. In the end, it becomes an endless, tortured circle of gift-buying, where everyone loses and the stores win.

My one attempt at going to a major shopping mall failed miserably. The parking lot was so full that cars were everywhere, sometimes parked three deep. Every parking spot within two kilometres was full, and outraged drivers yelled at other outraged drivers in a scene that reminded me of some kind of sado-masochistic bumper car video game.

When you did get in, the experience was surreal – people lined up to get into stores, credit cards flashing in the air, adults and children screaming and crying, all packed into a space so filled with other people that the floor was completely invisible under the mob.

As Winter Wonderland began to play for the 800th time, people looked haunted and scared, frantically glancing at their watches. It was like a post-apocalyptic movie where Santa Claus takes over the world and remakes it in his yuletide image. I ran out screaming. The memory (and the nightmares) bolstered my resolve to escape, and even during Boxing Day, I stayed far away from anything that could be vaguely mistaken for a retail outlet.

And Boxing Day is itself a mystery I have yet to solve. Its purpose seems to be to sell things for even less than they sold for a week earlier. The origins of Boxing Day are so shrouded in secrecy that after 10 minutes of research into the subject, I turned up only the facts that Dec. 26 is Boxing Day, and the day of the founding of the Communist Party of India (1925).

Knowing what we do about Boxing Day sales, I find it surprising that anyone goes shopping at all before Christmas. First, people spend all their money (and more) before Christmas, and then they are offered more things for less money immediately thereafter. After the first time, I would be suspicious. After the second time, I wouldn't spend any money until Boxing Day.

Tell your kids more presents will come the next day, when you can afford more presents for less money, fight fewer people to do it and still get presents for anyone you wish. Aside from beating people over the head with the shear volume of ads and flyers saying, "Hey shoppers, things will cost less in two days," there is not much more that can be done to make the point clear.

Next year, when you are faced with the burden of holiday gift shopping, do yourself a favour and wait a few weeks. Not only will you escape the evil of Santa Claus's world retail domination, you might also qualify for membership in the Communist Party of India.

The Kirshner File

Ariel Sharon transformed himself

Ariel (Arik) Sharon fought his last battle last week as he teetered between life and death. The Israeli prime minister, having been felled by a massive cerebral hemorrhage on Jan. 4, was in critical condition in Hadassah Hospital after undergoing surgical procedures to staunch bleeding in his brain. Even if he survives this dire bout with mortality, Sharon's prospects for a full recovery and returning to work are extremely slim. Sharon's political career is effectively over, his powers having been transferred to his deputy, Ehud Olmert, the former mayor of Jerusalem. Facing fresh elections on March 28, Israel has been plunged into a season of uncertainty as Israelis ponder the implications of the end of the Sharon era.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Prior to the latest turn of events, Sharon, 77, seemed comfortably positioned to win his third consecutive term since February 2001. True, he suffered a minor stroke on Dec. 18, but he bounced back from that setback. Sharon, having bolted the Likud party after Israel's momentous withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and four isolated settlements in the northern West Bank last summer, formed a new centrist party, Kadima, on Nov. 21. His decision to resign from the Likud, a right-wing party he had been instrumental in creating, reinforced the impression that he planned to carry out further unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank following his re-election. In the wake of last year's pullouts, he ruled out additional unilateral steps. But if he had not intended to make more moves, he would have remained at the helm of the Likud, which is now headed, once again, by his perennial rival Benjamin Netanyahu.

Sharon claimed that he was committed to the 2003 "road map," the yet-to-be-implemented internationally-sponsored peace plan that envisages a two-state solution. But in all probability, Sharon's strategic objective was to draw Israel's final borders by unilateral means – the withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the West Bank, the construction of a 685-kilometre separation fence along the Green Line and through the West Bank, and the expansion of settlements in major blocs encompassing 80 per cent of Jewish settlers.

Rightly or wrongly, Sharon concluded that there was no trustworthy Palestinian partner with whom he could negotiate long-term interim agreements, which he had previously promoted. Sharon often said that he would not engage Mahmoud Abbas, the current president of the Palestinian Authority, in talks unless Abbas seriously cracked down on armed Palestinian militias, from Islamic Jihad to the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, which have repeatedly broken last February's unwritten truce. Last October, Sharon's defence minister, Shaul Mofaz, went even further, dismissing Abbas as "a one-man show" and ruling out the possibility of reaching peace with "the current Palestinian leadership." The Palestinian prime minister, Ahmed Qureia, responded in kind by declaring that Israel was "running away from peace" and "trying to impose unilateral solutions."

All rhetoric aside, the fact is that Abbas, being weak and indecisive, has not complied with one of the key provisions of the road map, the clause that enjoins the Palestinians to cease all violence against Israel immediately and unconditionally. Although there was a significant decrease in violence in 2005, the Palestinians are still sending out suicide bombers and shelling Israel with Qassam rockets and mortars. But Israel has also been remiss in fulfilling its "road map" obligations, not having put a full stop to settlement activity and tolerating unauthorized outposts.

It remains to be seen how Sharon's interim successor will deal with these pivotal issues should he, as likely, defeat Netanyahu in the forthcoming general election. Whatever approach Olmert adopts, it seems clear that Netanyahu has begun rebranding Likud as a moderate party. In recent remarks, he said that a Likud prime minister, Menachem Begin, signed the 1979 peace treaty with Egypt, that the Likud backed the 1994 peace treaty with Jordan, and that he, as premier, signed "responsible, measured agreements" with the Palestinians. He was referring to the 1997 Hebron agreement and the 1998 Wye accord. In the same spirit, Netanyahu has marginalized Moshe Feiglin, an extremist Likud figure.

Tellingly enough, Sharon, an army general until his retirement in 1972, resorted to similar tactics during the 2001 election campaign, when he moderated his policies and promised voters "peace and security," which he never delivered. Until that point, Sharon – the son of two Russian immigrants, Samuel and Vera Scheinerman, who arrived in Palestine in 1922 – was driven by a hawkish outlook. A man who was physically present at virtually every seminal moment in Israel's history, from the 1948 war on down, Sharon was deeply suspicious of his Arab adversaries and believed that the only language they understood was the language of force.

Ariel (Arik) Sharon

One of Israel's founding fathers, Sharon was born on Feb. 27, 1928, in Kfar Malal, a moshav south of Petah Tikvah. A member of the Haganah, he fought in the War of Independence, leading an infantry company in the battle for Latroun. In 1953, he founded and led the 101 special commando unit, which carried out reprisals against Arab terrorists. In a highly controversial retaliatory raid, he attacked a village in Jordan, Qibya, killing numerous civilians.

During the 1956 Sinai war, he led a paratroop corps. Commanding an armoured division during the 1967 Six Day War and heading the Southern Command during much of the War of Attrition, he destroyed the terrorist infrastructure in the Gaza Strip in 1971. He left the army after being passed over for promotion as chief of staff. But he was pressed into service in 1973 as the commander of a division in the Yom Kippur War. As a soldier, Sharon was bold, innovative and magnetic, and will be remembered for the courage and daring he displayed in the crossing into Africa, an offensive that turned the tide of the war.

Yet Sharon had his defects, as Uzi Benziman writes in his biography, Sharon. He had a tendency to flout orders, his relations with others were self-serving, and he did not hesitate to lie. These qualities, as well as his unbounded ambition and his ability to focus, served him well as a politician.

Elected to the Knesset shortly after the 1973 war, Sharon joined Begin's Herut party in 1977 after a stint as Yitzhak Rabin's security advisor. Appointed minister of agriculture in Begin's first government, Sharon expanded Israel's previously modest network of settlements in the West Bank, establishing facts on the ground.

Subsequently, as minister of defence, he evacuated Israel's settlements in the Sinai Peninsula in order to preserve Israel's peace agreement with Egypt. As well, he conceived and coordinated the 1982 invasion of Lebanon, a venture that more or less imploded when Israel's Christian Phalange allies murdered hundreds of Palestinian civilians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in a human and public relations disaster. In 1983, the Kahan Commission found him indirectly responsible for the massacre, and he stepped down in disgrace.

A survivor, Sharon gradually rehabilitated himself, first as minister of industry and trade in a national unity government (1984-1990) and then as minister of construction and housing (1990-1992) in Yitzhak Shamir's cabinet. In both portfolios, Sharon consolidated Israel's presence in the West Bank, Gaza and Golan Heights (which he was loath to relinquish, even in exchange for peace with Syria). As foreign minister under Netanyahu, he acceded to the Wye accord, but then urged Jewish zealots to seize hilltops in the West Bank and establish outposts.

Despite his willingness to cede Sinai settlements, Sharon opposed the land-for-peace formula, as embodied in United Nations Resolution 242. He voted against the 1978 Camp David agreement and was an ardent opponent of the 1993 Oslo accords. "We do not trade land for peace," he said in 1991. At best, he offered the Arabs "peace for peace," claiming that territorial concessions "will only bring us closer to war." Hewing to this stance, he harshly criticized the sweeping concessions made by the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Barak, to the Palestinian leader, Yasser Arafat, at the failed Camp David summit in 2000.

As leader of the Likud, Sharon triggered rage and indignation among Palestinians when he visited the Temple Mount, in eastern Jerusalem, on Sept. 28, 2000. Sharon's motive was to shore up his political position and lay claim to that area, but his visit touched off the second Palestinian uprising. As prime minister, Sharon's response to the intifadah was tough. He exerted constant military pressure on the terrorists and isolated his nemesis, Arafat.

But eventually, he publicly acknowledged that Palestinian statehood was inevitable and conceded that Israel, for largely demographic reasons, could not sustain its occupation of Gaza. By embarking on this path, he alienated his base and buried the dream of Greater Israel, but he emerged as Israel's most popular politician. In doing so, he recast himself as a pragmatist and realigned Israeli politics. This will be his legacy.

CBC Radio reporter credits success to reading

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As a child with her nose stuck in whatever books she could get her hands on, Marsha Lederman loved the idea of creating pictures in her head with words rather than images.

"I love telling a story through sounds and words and putting pictures in people's imaginations," said Lederman, CBC Radio's national arts reporter.

"I think that comes from reading a lot as a child and having the pictures in my imagination instead of being up on a screen. I think that had an impact of what I wanted to do: tell stories without the actual pictures."

The 39-year-old North York native said she has always known she wanted to be a writer, and took the necessary steps to land her dream job.

Lederman enrolled in the radio and television arts program at Ryerson University in Toronto in 1985, and after she graduated with honours, she took advantage of every opportunity that came her way.

Before landing her first job with CBC Radio reading the news on the Metro Morning show and, later on, Ontario Morning, Lederman made a point of leaving her comfort zone of Toronto to work in cities such as Barrie, Hamilton, and Vancouver. She even moved as far away as Ireland to broaden her scope.

She also hosted a talk show on Talk 640 in Toronto before she achieved her goal of joining the CBC.

"I knew I wanted to be a writer, and I was very interested in journalism, and I was particularly interested in broadcast journalism because I like to speak, I like to talk. That sounds bizarre," Lederman said with a laugh.

Marsha Lederman

"I liked to perform as a kid and it seemed like it was a good combination. I've always known this is what I wanted to do," she added.

"I love radio. I love the anonymity of it and I love the imagination that comes with radio," she said.

One of the benefits of being a journalist is that every day is a new opportunity to learn and inform, Lederman said.

"I love it, because I feel like I am a natural student. I love school. I love learning. The beautiful thing about being a journalist is that you are constantly learning something new, constantly exploring a new story, and then you… teach other people.

"It's fantastic. You're getting paid to learn something and talk about it or write about it, and I think it's great."

As CBC's arts reporter, Lederman interviews musicians, actors, authors and artists. She said she understands that the issues she tackles may not be life-changing, but her stories do help maintain a balance of politics and art.

"It's important that we know what is happening in the world. As an arts reporter, I'm not reporting on the war in Iraq or major international issues," she said.

"But I feel like arts and culture are just so important for the world to have and to be able to bring these stories to people. It's great to shine a light on great beauty and profound thought."

She recalled developing a documentary series about the Holocaust for Talk 640.

"It was the year that [film director Steven] Spielberg's Schindler's List came out and it was just about the same time that the issue was at the top of mind because of this film. It was really rewarding for me. I remember having a listener call in to say that they hadn't known about the Holocaust until hearing the piece that I did. To me that was very gratifying."

Although Lederman said she loves working at the CBC, she has another passion she refuses to give up.

"I would love to be writing. That was something that I loved to do and still love to do, although I find very little time for it now," she said.

She has a goal to eventually write a novel about human complexities and "the things in life and the world that frame those complexities."

"But it is hardly a back-up plan," she said. "It really should have been the other way around. I should have been a fiction writer with a back-up plan of being a journalist. As a fiction writer, chances are you're going to be starving. As a journalist, you're only close to starving. It's more practical," she said, exhibiting her dry wit.

Although writing may be her first love, Lederman said she couldn't be happier at the CBC, from which she can see herself retiring one day.

"I feel very blessed to work at CBC. I walk into that building many days and I look around the atrium and I think, I can't believe I get to work here and I get to do this job. I am so lucky."

Hamas, chaos may delay PA vote

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On the eve of the official Jan. 3 kickoff of the Palestinian election campaign, major Canadian and international media outlets reported skeptically about Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas's threat to delay parliamentary elections scheduled for Jan. 25 if Israel bars Arabs from voting in east Jerusalem.

Reuters, Associated Press, BBC, and CBC, among others, cited analysts who saw this as a tactic to divert attention from the PA's real concern: that Hamas may pose a serious challenge to Fatah's control of the Palestinian Authority. As the new year began, polls estimated that Hamas could win 40 per cent of the seats in Palestinian Legislative Council. A few even predicted a Hamas victory.

In Ha'aretz (Jan. 3), Arnon Regular wrote that Israeli officials are against allowing east Jerusalem Arabs to vote for Hamas, a terrorist organization committed to Israel's destruction. "However, they also do not want to be blamed for sabotaging the election and are said to be seeking a compromise." One idea being re-floated is to allow the Arabs to vote in Abu Dis and other villages surrounding Jerusalem. However, this has been wholly rejected by the Palestinians.

In the New York Times ("Abbas to discuss delay of elections with Hamas," Jan 3), Steven Erlanger interviewed Khalil Shikaki, a highly respected Palestinian pollster and director of the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research. Shikaki said that while Israel's policy on the east Jerusalem vote is currently ambiguous, Israel will prevent the vote if this stand is backed by the United States and the European Union. "Israel will play along and take the blame, only if the international community winks and says, 'Please give Fatah the excuse.'" Erlanger noted that with indications the United States is urging Israel to allow the elections, "it appears that Fatah does not yet have its excuse."

Journalists also focused on the growing chaos in the Gaza Strip. Gunmen from various clans and gangs have kidnapped foreigners, shot at PA police, and taken over government buildings. "Palestinian police have been unable to halt the violence that has gripped Gaza since Israel withdrew in September," reported CBC News (CBC.ca, Jan. 2).

A case in point was the Dec. 28 kidnapping of Kate Burton, a British human rights worker, and her visiting parents.

CTV's Tom Kennedy reported about the family's release on Dec. 31: "[There have been] more than a dozen kidnappings in Gaza in the past year," Kennedy said. "Palestinian leaders call the kidnappers despicable but seem powerless to stop them."

On CBC Radio's World Report (Dec. 31), Aaron Schacter also dealt with the Burton kidnapping. He said that the abductions of foreigners "have underlined the inability of Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas to impose order [in Gaza] since Israel's withdrawal in September" and may diminish Abbas's chances in the upcoming elections.

Schacter also spoke about the barrage of Qassam rockets that Palestinians have launched from Gaza towards Israel's southern coastal cities. Abbas has been unable to stop the assaults, even though groups such as Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, an adjunct of Fatah, Abbas's own ruling party, have carried out many of the rocket launchings – among other acts of violence.

In the midst of the chaos, lawlessness and violence, a number of NGOs and all unnecessary UN field workers have left Gaza. At the same time, several dozen European election monitors have begun to deploy in the West Bank and Gaza, despite the concern for their security. Several analysts question whether Palestinian elections can be held at all when even PA police officers are not safe from armed gangs. The same concern applies, of course, to the Canadian monitors who are scheduled to join the team already in place.

In the Jan. 3 New Republic, editor-in-chief Martin Peretz looked at the broader implications of the chaos in the PA. "How has all this registered in Israel? The fact is that almost no one any longer believes in a negotiated peace with the Palestinians. Not because sensible and humane Israelis can't imagine a fair divide of the land between the river and the sea. But because Gaza has truly shown them that there are – let's be perfectly frank – no Palestinians with whom to treat."

Two convicted in Roma hate case

Two men pleaded guilty last week to hate promotion charges in connection with a white supremacist demonstration against Roma (also known as Gypsies) outside a Toronto motel in 1997. Charges against four others were dropped.

Canadian Jewish Congress, which monitored the case, reported that one of the defendants was given a conditional discharge and the other received a suspended sentence. Both are required to write a letter of apology to the Roma community.

The judge in the case made it clear this was not a minor offence in any way, Congress reported. She also noted that none of the defendants was still involved in the white supremacist movement, or had committed other criminal offences.

In 1997, members of a white supremacist group held a demonstration outside the Lido Motel in Toronto where a number of recently arrived Roma refugees from Czechoslovakia were being housed. The accused were charged with promoting hatred against Roma.

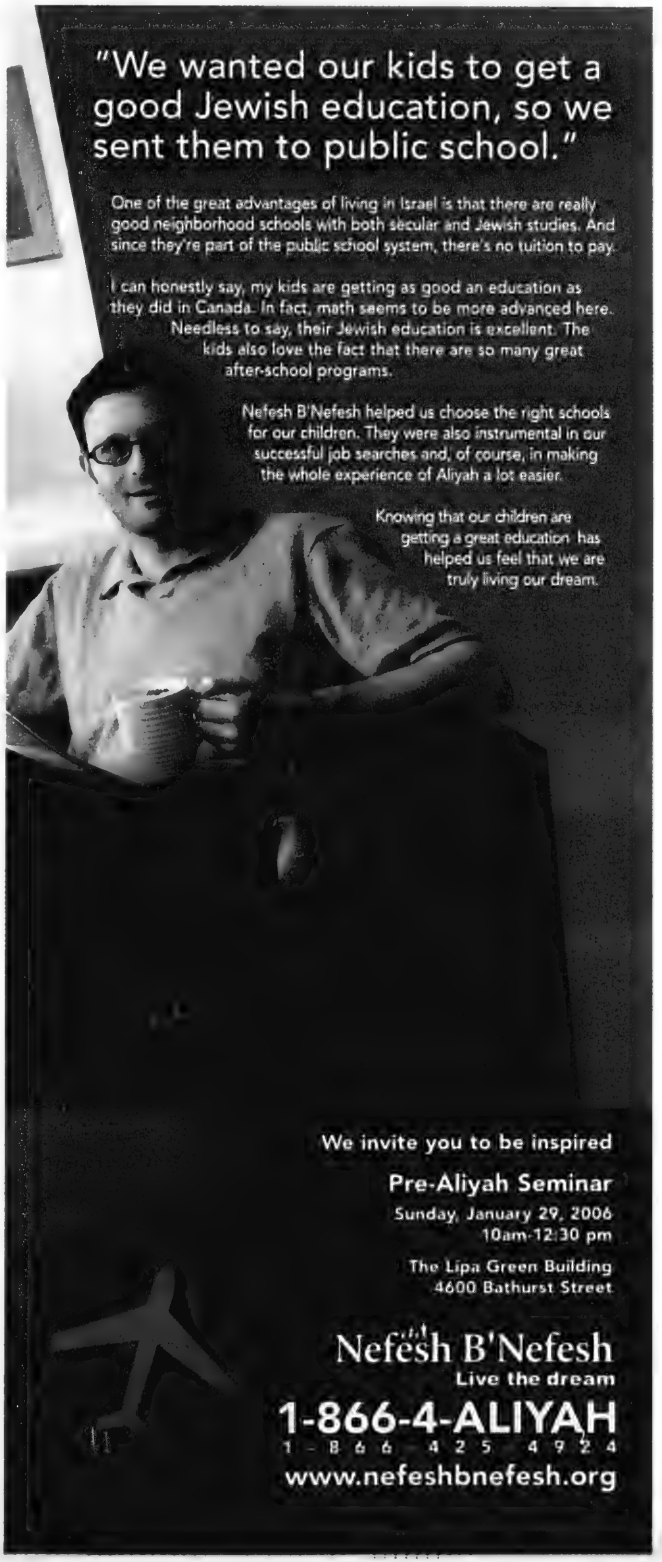
The six defendants were acquitted in March 2000 in the Ontario Court of Justice when the court accepted defence arguments that evidence presented referred only to Gypsies and not Roma.

The case eventually ended up in the Supreme Court of Canada, where the acquittals were overturned last February. At that time, a new trial was also ordered.

"We are satisfied with this result," said Joel Richler, chair of Congress' Ontario region who also acted as legal counsel to Congress on its intervention in the case at the Supreme Court.

"The convictions in this case make it clear to all Canadians that this kind of hatred will not be tolerated in a civil society," he said last week.

"This feels like waking up from a bad dream," said Paul St. Clair, executive director of the Roma Community Centre. "This decision brings closure to the Roma community, thanks to the tireless effort of Congress and the Toronto police."



"We wanted our kids to get a good Jewish education, so we sent them to public school."
One of the great advantages of living in Israel is that there are really good neighborhood schools with both secular and Jewish studies. And since they're part of the public school system, there's no tuition to pay.
I can honestly say, my kids are getting as good an education as they did in Canada. In fact, math seems to be more advanced here. Needless to say, their Jewish education is excellent. The kids also love the fact that there are so many great after-school programs.
Nefesh B'Nefesh helped us choose the right schools for our children. They were also instrumental in our successful job searches and, of course, in making the whole experience of Aliyah a lot easier.
Knowing that our children are getting a great education has helped us feel that we are truly living our dream.
We invite you to be inspired

Pre-school director's retirement signals end of era

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre underwent a major renovation a few years ago that transformed the 52-year-old structure, originally known as the YMHA, into a strikingly modern glass building.

But its preschool – consisting of two light-filled classrooms filled with books, art supplies, toys and animals including a rabbit, mouse, fish and frogs – has changed very little over the years. Even the toddler-sized tables and chairs are original.

"Whoever designed the building was a genius!" enthused Hélène Comay last month, a week before her Dec. 23 retirement. "Both rooms opening on a playground. Big windows. Light."

Hélène, as she is known to the children, will be honoured at a Feb. 5, Sunday afternoon tribute at the JCC. The event, with entertainment by local jazz singer Molly Johnson, is also a fundraiser for the school.

Although she began teaching at the school in 1957, it was only about five years ago, as Comay entered her mid-70s, that she began to ask herself when she ought to retire.

"I still like what I'm doing," she would think, postponing a decision.

But last year she realized that the time to retire would in fact be while she was still enjoying the work that kept her busy morning and afternoon, five days a week.

"She hasn't slowed down," said Soraya Yacoubi, who has taught with Comay for the past 10 years and is now on maternity leave. "She has the same passion and dedication to her work.

"She treats the children with great respect, and she listens to them."

Comay – born Hélène du Bouchet in 1926 in Paris, France – was a classroom teacher at the school for 48 years. For more than 40 years, she also served as the school's director. Her modest "office" was a desk tucked into the corner of the room linking the two classrooms, which also houses, among other things, the children's washroom.

For Comay, a mother of two and grandmother of four, her work has always been centred on the children's needs.

"It's a very play-based school," she said. The program is "very much individualized… We look at each kid and go from there."

As a young woman, Comay thought she wanted to work as a children's therapist. In 1949, she and her husband Eli moved to London, England, where he was involved in doctoral research. While there, Comay called child psycholanalysis pioneer Anna Freud to inquire about studying with her.

"She was very wise," recalled Comay, perched on a childsize chair for the interview. "She said the first thing to do is get a job in a nursery school, get to know young children. Once I did that, I felt that's where I wanted to be."

Comay's experience with youngsters dates back to her own teenage years. After France was invaded by the Nazis in 1940, Comay's family left Paris and made their way to Boston, where she worked with terminally ill children in a hospital ward. Her mother was a doctor who following the Nazi invasion – could no longer practice medicine because she was Jewish.

Comay, who was educated at Mount Holyoke College and Radcliffe College (now Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study Harvard University), also lived in Chicago and Montreal, before settling in Toronto.

She is a firm believer in exposing children to good literature, good toys, good art materials and good music. In the nursery, she read to the children every day – books that she deemed well-written and with a good story.

"I'm passionately interested in having kids hooked on good books so that when they're ready to read, this is something that will be important to them."

What does it take to be a good preschool teacher? "It's a matter of remembering what it was like to be a child," Comay said. "And listening."

On January 23 Re-elect
Ken Dryden
in York Centre
Since the last election there has been a lot of noise.
But we were elected to govern.
Our biggest campaign promises had to do with health care, assistance for cities and early learning and child care.
The result:
• a 10-year agreement ($41.3 billion) with provinces to protect publicly funded health care (including reduction of wait times)
• historic agreements to make cities more livable (including $350m for TTC and $385m for GO Transit)
• as Minister of Social Development: 10 provinces, 10 agreements - towards creating a national system of early learning and child care.
All this while maintaining balanced budgets, reducing debt and lowering personal income taxes, and an economy that in terms of employment growth and rate of increase in living standards, is first in the G7
Regarding Canada and Israel:
• as Minister, my first overseas trip was to Israel where I brought to life long-hoped for negotiations on pension payments for Canadians living in Israel and Israelis living in Canada
• as Minister, I concluded an agreement between Social Development Canada and Palestinian Ministry of Social Affairs to help them create the structure and governance needed to deliver social services more effectively
• as a Government, we made six important vote changes on UN Resolutions.
There is a lot more yet to do, and we would like to do it
I am very proud to be your Member of Parliament

Mae Waese fought for changes in education

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Obituary

Mae Waese, who was instrumental in working for improvements that would help educate all children in the Toronto area, and an active community advocate, died of cancer on Jan. 4. She was 74.

A skilled negotiator, Waese served as a trustee on the North York Board of Education from 1978 to 1986 and was its chair from 1983-86. At the same time, she sat on the Metropolitan Toronto School Board, which she chaired from 1988-92. She had a reputation for meeting every challenge, using each one as an opportunity to explore methods of improving a situation.

Regardless of what position she held or awards she received, Waese held on to her roots – her family, longtime friends and colleagues.

Her parents had come to Canada from Dridz, Poland, and throughout her life, she took an interest in the Dridzer Benevolent Society where she served as president.

The eldest of four daughters, she went to King Edward Public School and then to Harbord Collegiate.

After her marriage and while raising her three children, she enrolled in Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) at University of Toronto and obtained a degree in adult education. She later served on the board of governors at OISE.

Her lifelong association and commitment to education began when her children attended Wilmington Public School in the 1960s. Waese spearheaded the introduction of French into the public school system and was an active member of the committee that brought alternative education to the Wilmington school. She was the president of the Wilmington Home and School Association and set in motion many innovative projects.

At the same time, she became active with the National Council of Jewish Women and served on the executive both locally and nationally and as the chair of Council's Suburban Study branch where she was a member for some 50 years.

Her commitment and determination, which often challenged the status quo, brought her into contact with politicians and community leaders. Three years ago, she was appointed to the board of the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons.

Waese's associations reached all segments of the Jewish and general community, including the Urban Alliance on Race Relations, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the North York Library Board and numerous others.

Among the many accolades and awards that she was given, in 1999, she received the Dr. Harry Paikin Memorial Award from the Ontario Public School Association. The award recognizes the outstanding contribution of individuals across Ontario to the educational system.

Waese is survived by her husband, Lou, children Heather and Arnon Glatter, Bradley and Karen, James and Matt, five grandchildren and sisters and brothers-in-law Marcia and the late Sigmund Lightman, Barbara and Gerry Raber and Ronnie

Jewish Life

The immigrant who was 'different'

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Not everyone came to Canada through Halifax's famous Pier 21. In December 1956, one young man's crossing ended in eastern Canada's "other" port – picturesque Quebec City. From there, it was a short train ride to Montreal.

It was not a search for adventure or fortune that brought immigrants like this one to Canada at the time – it was Moroccan independence. After years of European colonization of Africa (by France and Spain, in the case of Morocco) and years of social upheaval and political instability, Morocco was independent.

The Jews had always favoured the European presence, which they saw as progressive, enlightened and full of opportunity. Now, with the country reverting back to a Muslim state, foreboding and uncertainty were the order of the day. Rumours were rampant, among them that all young men would be forcibly conscripted into the king's newly formed army. Even though he was an only son, this young man's family spirited him out of the country.

On his second day in Montreal, at the direction of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), our young man went out looking for work. His first attempts were typical of what thousands of other Jews of North African descent would encounter.

Our eager young immigrant found himself sitting in front of a Jewish tailor. It seemed that, as pleasantly as he presented himself, the tailor was increasingly more suspicious and uncomfortable. It was soon apparent that the interview was centred more on the religion of the applicant than on his ability to do the job.

The same question arose again and again. "What is your religion?" "Are you Jewish? Are you really Jewish? Are your parents and family Jewish?" It didn't seem to matter that JIAS had arranged this appointment, that both the applicant's first and last name were biblical; the Jewish tailor could not accept that this dark-skinned young man in front of him, so fluent in French (but with not a word of Yiddish) could really be Jewish.

"Where are you from?"

"Morocco."

"Morocco? Are there Jews in Morocco?"

"Well, yes of course."

"What kind of Jews?"

In desperation, the young man produced his passport which clearly indicated his name and that of his parents – all biblical. His religion was even noted: Jewish. Still the suspicious tailor fumbled with the passport. What, he asked were those scribbled lines on the document? Arabic writing, was the response. Arabic writing! "Are you an Arab?"

"No sir, I'm Jewish."

After much humiliating repetition, a job was indeed offered. The problem was the pay was so ridiculously low that it was evident this was not an offer at all but a ruse to convince the immigrant himself to decline. For the Ashkenazi Jew of the time, it was much too bizarre to accept an individual as a fellow Jew whose complexion was not as fair as his own, who spoke not a word of Yiddish, whose family name was not of Germanic origin, who hailed from Africa – from an Arabic country to boot.

This must be an Arab imposter, the tailor would reason. He can't be one of us.

Eventually, the young man found a government job. Able to communicate excellently in French, he became friends with his co-workers who soon took a liking to him.

"Dans quelle eglise priez-vous?" they asked him. "At which church do you worship"

"Well," answered the young man, "actually none. You see, I'm Jewish."

"Pas possible! Jews aren't French. Who ever heard of a French Jew? Jews speak only Yiddish and a little English. Everyone knows that!"

Eventually our young immigrant settled in Toronto, where a three-month contract with the government evolved into a 30-year-plus career as a civil servant. He is now actively and happily retired, a proud Jew who might still only know but a few Yiddish words – a shanda!

10 words for the new year

1. Solitude

Someone who does not reserve one hour every day for oneself is not human – Nachman of Bratslav

Being alone does not mean being lonely. It means cutting off the external, the superficial and the superfluous, and seeking instead the inner strength which one finds best in solitude. It enriches the spirit and ennobles the person, and one who denies himself its refuge in not living life to its fullest. – Henry King

2. Laughter

To laugh at ourselves we have to stand outside ourselves – and that is an immense benefit. Our puffed-up pride and touchy self-importance vanish: a clean and sweet humility begins to take possession of us. We are on the way to growing a soul. – A. Powell Davies

A man without mirth is like a wagon without springs. He is jolted disagreeably by every pebble in the road. – H. W. Beecher

3. Time

Living one day at a time is the magic that lifts the crushing burden from our shoulders and divides our time into manageable portions. On God's clock for human beings there is no yesterday, no tomorrow – only the great now. – G. M. Mathews

Finish your day and be done with it. You have done what you could. Some blunders and absurdities no doubt crept in; forget them as soon as you can. Tomorrow is a new day; begin it well and serenely and with too high a spirit to be cumbered with your old nonsense. This day is all that is good and fair. It is too dear, with its hopes and invitations, to waste a moment on the yesterday. – Ralph Waldo Emerson

4. Hope

I avow my faith that we are marching toward better days. Humanity will not be cast down. We are going on – swinging bravely forwards along the grand high road – and already behind the distant mountains is the promise of the sun. – Winston Churchill

If you have occasional spells of despondency and self-pity, if once in a while you begin to feel sorry for yourself, don't despair! The sun has a sinking spell every night, but it rises again all right the next morning. – Rabbi Richard C. Hertz

5. Friendship

Friendship is like a treasury; you cannot take from it more that you put into it. Benjamin Mandelstamm

Friendship is like stone. A stone has no value, but by rubbing one stone against another, sparks of fire emerge. – chassidic source

6. Thought

A man's mind stretched by a new idea can never go back to its original dimensions. – Oliver Wendall Holmes

A great people think they are thinking when they are merely rearranging their prejudices. – William James

7. Learning

Too many of our people want an easy-going religion, one which does not interfere with their leisure, their sleep or their television, which calls for no study and no observance, which does not challenge or disturb them, a religion without any spiritual travail, without any stab of thought or conscience, without any sacrifices, the religion of a self-pampering people. No religion has ever survived in that kind of emotional and intellectual vacuum, Judaism least of all. – Rabbi A. H. Silver

8. Contentment

When Pyrrhus was about to sail for Italy, Cineas, a wise and good man, asked him what his intentions and expectations were.

"To conquer Rome," said Pyrrhus

"And after that?"

"We will subdue Carthage, Macedonia, all Africa and all Greece."

"And when we have conquered all we can, what shall we do?"

"Do? Why, then we will sit down and spend our time in peace and comfort."

"Ah, my Lord," said the wise Cineas. "What prevents our being in peace and comfort right now?" – George L. Walton

9. Happiness

Happiness sneaks in through a door you didn't know you left open. – John Barrymore

If your ever find happiness by hunting for it, you will find it as the old man did his lost spectacles – on his nose all the time. Josh Billings

The secret to being miserable is to have enough leisure to bother about whether you are happy or not. – G. B. Shaw

10. Caring

The person who has learned to be kind has mastered the most vital subject in life's curriculum. If he has learned how to bring a ray of light where there is darkness, a touch of softness where life has been hard, a word of cheer to lift drooping spirits – that person is best equipped to live life as it should be lived. – Rabbi Sidney Greenberg

The ROM's Chinese-Jewish artifacts

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

A wooden Torah case, two pages from a Rosh Hashanah machzor and several other artifacts from the historic Jewish community of Kaifeng, China, are on view in the newly restored galleries of the Royal Ontario Museum that opened in late December.

Unless you know where these pieces are, you're liable to miss them as you stroll through the ROM's magnificent new display spaces, which show off the collections with crystalline clarity.

The items of Chinese-Jewish provenance are in the display case to your right as you enter the Mathews Family Court of Chinese Sculpture, one of a set of adjoining galleries that runs alongside Philosophers' Walk. Although these interesting and storied pieces have been loaned to other institutions (including Israel's Beit Hatfutsoth Museum) in recent decades, they haven't been dusted off for home display since the early 1980s.

The display case also contains a drain mouth and chime stone from the Kaifeng synagogue, among items related to other foreign religions. The drain mouth was used for ritual washing and the chime stone was likely rung to call congregants to prayer, in imitation of Eastern practices. "The synagogue was just like a Chinese temple, except that it faced west towards Jerusalem," according to Sara Irwin, the ROM's specialist in bronze-age China and other disciplines.

Hanging on the wall, a rubbing from a stone stele details the community's history: one side dates from 1489, the other from 1523. The Chinese inscriptions record that the first Jews came to Kaifeng as traders; Irwin suggests they traded in cotton or silk and probably arrived before 1126, when the city was capital of the Northern Song dynasty.

As the slightly corrupted Hebrew of the machzor pages reveals, the community had been in steady decline long before its last rabbi died about 1800. A long-established pattern of scribal misspellings suggests that this isolated pocket of Jews had been slowly losing their knowledge of Hebrew over the generations.

Pathetically, the elders once displayed a Torah scroll in the marketplace, offering a reward to any traveller who could interpret it. "Morning and night, with tears in our eyes and with offerings of incenses do we implore that our religion may again flourish," one wrote in the mid-1800s. "We have everywhere sought about, but could find none who understood the letter of the Great Country (Hebrew) and that has occasioned us deep sorrow."

By the time Canadian Anglican Bishop William C. White (1873-1960) arrived in Henan province about 1910, the synagogue was long gone and only legends and artifacts remained.

As the famed collector travelled far and wide amassing what would become the ROM's extensive Chinese collections, he took a keen interest in the Jews of Kaifeng, even trying to revitalize the community by convening a conference of its descendants in the '30s. He was especially intrigued with Chinese-Jewish genealogy and found several historic Chinese war heroes and mandarins of Jewish descent.

The University of Toronto published White's definitive three-volume text, Chinese Jews, in 1942. The last in a series of five major works that he authored over a decade, it was reprinted as a single volume in 1966. Although the physical remnants of the Kaifeng community may be found in several international institutions, White's comprehensive study insures that the ROM will always be associated with this small, vanished Jewish outpost.

While he challenged other researchers to follow him in this "wonderful vista of adventures in historical exploration," perhaps no one will ever shed more light on the distinctively Oriental Jews of Kaifeng than this unlikely but determined specialist from Toronto.

Gefilte fish on the web – Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today we continue sampling the best Internet sites for that quintessential Jewish food – gefilte fish.

An excellent assortment of gefilte fish recipes can be found at the RCFJ Recipe Archives. [http://tinyurl.com/7q6d9] If you've tired of the classics, you can try your hand at Leslie's Mexican Gefilte Fish, Marian Burros's Gefilte Fish Loaf and Maryland Spicy Gefilte Fish. And for something a bit different, there's Alaskan Halibut and Salmon Gefilte Fish Terrine. There's even a recipe for Chrain, the perfect complement to gefilte fish, which calls for horseradish root, sugar, vinegar and mustard.

Over at the Jewish-food Gefilte Fish Archives, there's Dilled Salmon, Chilled Terrine, Beet Mould and 40 others. [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/gefindex.htm] Arielle offers five variations including Beet Gefilte Fish Mould. [http://recipes2.alastra.com/fish/]

One popular time saver is using a frozen loaf of fish that, according to its recipe, will give you "the look and taste of homemade." [http://tinyurl.com/8zhsm] But don't get Joe Hartman started. The owner of Hartman's Kosher Meats in Toronto sells roughly 30 loaves of gefilte fish each Friday afternoon, and says the delicacy is lost on the younger generation. "These kids don't appreciate what goes into making gefilte fish," he says. 'They don't put their heart and soul into it like their parents or grandparents did. It takes lots of work, but now you can just walk into any supermarket to buy it.'" [http://tinyurl.com/c85hj]

Tammy from New York seems to straddle both sides of the homemade versus store-bought debate. Tammy is the winner of the Great Gefilte Fish-off and has supplied her late bubbie's delicious recipe. But Tammy says, "FYI, making gefilte fish is, quite frankly, a pain in the ass. Even my grandmother would agree. She and I both got lazy in our old age and doctored the store-bought stuff, which turned out surprisingly well and fooled everyone." [http://tinyurl.com/8y3qn]

So if you want to cheat, the folks at Torahbytes want to help. They advise you to buy one large jar of gefilte fish. The secret of this recipe is adding your own beets, carrots, onions and seasonings to the fish. [http://www.torahbytes.org/sechel/Gefilte.htm].

Here's a suggestion for people who just love the idea of eating gefilte fish: Vegetarian Gefilte Fish. The recipe calls for eggs, onions, carrots, potato and matzah meal but not a speck of pike. [http://www.raskinfish.com/recipes.htm] On the other hand, if you hate fish (or have an allergy) but love the look of gefilte fish, then check out the "False (Chicken)" variation. [http://tinyurl.com/d9u9w]

Oddly, the ZenWeb Gefilte Fish page has no recipes, but it does have gorgeous pictures that show all the steps involved in preparing a traditional platter. [http://www.zenreich.com/ZenWeb/gefilte.htm]

Not surprisingly, there seems to be quite a bit of lore surrounding the origins of gefilte fish. Once fanciful legend traces them back to the Great Gefilte Lakes in Upstate New York. [http://tinyurl.com/85w58] Another tells of the mythical "Mighty Gefilte" that yielded to a Galilean fisherman. [http://tinyurl.com/75kgd]

Any good cook will tell you the secret to gefilte fish is finding just the right balance between ground fish such as pike, carp and, of course, whitefish. But Scott Gilbert has accomplished something few others can claim. The intrepid scientist at Swarthmore College's Society for Developmental Biology has actually photographed a "gefilte fish embryo." According to Gilbert, the picture on his website "is a chimeric pike and whitefish blastula which should (if all goes well) develop into a mature Gefilte." [http://tinyurl.com/9nk45]

A few years ago, the Israeli postal service probably did more to get gefilte fish into the mouths of thousands of people than a generation of bubbies. It immortalized the food on a postage stamp. Along with stamps honouring other classics like falafel and couscous, the gefilte fish stamp depicts five pieces of fish crowned with carrot slices. And in the top right corner of the stamp, the humble fish grinder. [http://tinyurl.com/cbl89]

The Slifkin affair: a lament for Orthodoxy

By JOSEPH YOSSI ADLER

The Torah exhorts us to passionately and diligently seek justice (Deuteronomy 18:30). Demanding intellectual honesty and creating an environment where differences of opinion may be aired without fear of consequence are certainly important components of justice. Recent developments in the Orthodox Jewish world, however, cast doubt on whether this ideal is achievable.

Guest Voice

The vast majority of the western World has accepted the age of the universe and certain other well-established scientific principles. But there is a segment of Orthodox Jewry led by some rabbinic figures in B'nei Brak in Israel that has questioned some of these fundamental assumptions. Even an allegorical reading of the creation story in Genesis is considered taboo in some of these circles, notwithstanding that many well-respected rabbinic figures over the centuries have supported such a less-than-literal reading.

Now that alone would not be so vexing, but in the last year, a haredi scholar named Rabbi Nosson Slifkin, along with his religious texts which attempt to reconcile science and Torah by using traditional sources, has been added to a fast-growing list of banned Jewish authors and writings. Furthermore, a prominent Toronto rabbi, Rav Shlomo Miller of Kollel Avrecihim (who is a known and respected rabbinic figure in haredi circles worldwide) recently issued a letter in which he joins over 30 prominent haredi rabbis in condemning Rav Slifkin and banning his books.

The ban is about a year old, but only recently has a rabbinic figure in the Toronto community as prominent as Rav Miller joined those who have advanced the ban. In his letter, Rav Miller further suggests that this "wicked man" breached certain fundamentals of faith, though none were specifically enumerated. This approach is symptomatic of a much wider offensive launched by the haredim to silence once-traditional opinions with which they disagree.

In addition to the ban of Rav Slifkin's texts and other "disapproved" writings, the past couple of years have seen certain widely renowned haredi rabbis and yeshiva luminaries in Israel, the United States and Canada joining together to publicly ban various modern technologies (including the use of the Internet and cellphones and the viewing of movies on airplanes) and have imposed stricter guidelines for kashrut observance and other areas of Jewish practice.

Notwithstanding that life for Orthodox Jews is already very circumscribed and difficult, these haredi leaders are determined to set their lines in the sand and to impose their will even upon large communities of Orthodox Jews who do not subscribe to their stringent interpretation of Torah.

These troubling developments have unleashed a tidal wave of concern within modern Orthodox and even some haredi circles and have caused this writer, as well as many others within the Toronto community and worldwide, a great deal of pain and distress.

It is important to note that those concerned about the treatment of Rav Slifkin, for example, accept, even embrace, the rights of others to disagree with the content of his texts, as we all believe in the fundamental freedom to articulate disagreements on matters of religious faith. We have no quarrel with those who may take an opposing opinion, and in fact, our tradition encourages genuine debate and dialogue, as evidenced by the scores of debates in the Mishnah, the Talmud and the thousands of religious texts published thereafter. Debate is entirely healthy provided that it is "for the sake of heaven."

Our concern is that the condemnation of Rav Slifkin and the ban on him and his writings are precisely designed to quash any such debate. We also strenuously object to the harsh and cavalier manner in which Rav Slifkin has been treated by these haredi leaders. We have yet to learn of the particulars of the complaint against Rav Slifkin that would warrant such a harsh condemnation. After all, Rav Slifkin is now an outcast in his own community, his livelihood has been damaged and his reputation tarnished, all without a fair hearing. The rabbis who condemned Rav Slifkin and his words acted without regard to the principles of justice as envisioned by the Torah.

As a result of these categorical condemnations of a man of Torah and his words of knowledge, tensions within the Toronto Orthodox community have been exacerbated. Those who question the motives of these haredi rabbis lose faith in their leadership and their ability to represent an authentic Orthodox Judaism that is palatable to them. This crisis of faith will have grave ramifications for years to come, both in terms of the relationship between the modern Orthodox and the haredi worlds, and in terms of the haredi relationship to the world at large.

I fervently urge members of the Toronto Jewish community to support Rav Slifkin in his efforts to publish and disseminate his texts, and to condemn in the strongest terms possible any attempts to silence or demonize him and those that support dissenting opinions. We must resist their attempts to eliminate open discussion at every possible opportunity. We must feel free to cite traditional sources without fear of haredi reprisals. And, finally, we must insist on our right to exchange ideas in an open and respectful environment, as our collective future depends on it. Justice and Torah demand no less.

Joseph Yossi Adler is a lawyer and a concerned Orthodox Jew.

Layton saw himself as Jewish maverick in stuffy Canada

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

His authorized biographer Francis Mansbridge wrote in Irving Layton: God's Recording Angel that the celebrated poet saw himself as a "hot-blooded Jew cavorting in the Canadian drawing room, kicking out the windows to allow fresh air to enter."

In his heyday in the postwar period and into the 1960s, the pugnacious Layton styled himself as the outsider who was going to shake up the staid sensibilities of English Canada and make poetry a force for raising consciousness. He also liked to tweak his fellow Jews for their bourgeois complacency and philistinism.

But try as he might, Layton made few enemies, at least, not for long. The outpouring of tributes upon his death last week at age 93 after suffering from Alzheimer's disease for a dozen years reflects the affection many held for him. With his years of bluster and swagger long behind him, the once leonine Layton in the past decade had become almost a pussycat.

Many were moved by his physical frailty, the decline of his mental and creative powers, and his aloneness, despite five marriages, four of which were official.

He had been living since November 2000 at Maimonides Geriatric Centre, where he enjoyed having his works read to him.

Extraordinarily prolific, he published 50 books between 1945 and 1992. His poetry had a lyrical and romantic style, but the content was often ironic, acerbic or erotic. Jewish themes were common.

University of Ottawa English professor Seymour Mayne believes Layton is second only to A.M. Klein among Canadian Jewish poets, and ranks with Canada's best five or six ever.

He thinks Layton has a lasting place in the Canadian canon, and he expects his work will now receive the scholarly and critical interest that it did not while he was alive. Among readers he already sees a revival, especially among the young. His students like his poems, especially for their wit.

Layton's relationship with the Jewish community, though sometimes strained, remained strong, and he was "fiercely" Jewish, after his own fashion, Mayne said. He pointed out that after the Six Day War, Layton became a supporter of Israel, and did not waver in later years. In the 1970s, he took part in demonstrations for the freedom of Soviet Jewry.

In person, Layton was vivacious and gave his full attention to people he was with, Mayne said. "He was especially generous with his time and counsel to other, younger writers who would take their troubles to him. His door was always open. In that way he was like a chassidic rebbe, ready with a sympathetic ear and word of advice."

Retired Concordia University English professor Mervyn Butovsky thinks Layton rushed far too much material to print before it was fit to be published. But he said some of his poems are very good, especially those that were heartfelt.

Butovsky, who was a contributor to the 1993 "festschrift" anthology Raging Like a Fire: A Celebration of Irving Layton, along with some of Canada's leading literary figures, said Layton "picked and chose" various and often disparate elements, from the Israeli army to Karl Marx, to construct a complex Jewish identity that suited him.

One of his last anthologies, Fortunate Exile, published by McClelland and Stewart in 1987, was devoted to his writings on a Jewish theme. It was dedicated to "Father Abraham and his angry progeny."

Butovsky points out that Layton said he saw himself as "a prophet and a clown," which was bound to perplex others.

In 1997, on his 85th birthday, friends rallied in Montreal to raise money for full-time care to allow the failing Layton to stay in his home. In 1999, the Montreal Jewish community paid tribute to Layton with an evening during Jewish Book Month, held soon after the release of his son David's scathing childhood memoir Motion Sickness.

There were 20 speakers, including his eldest child Max, then 53, who distanced himself from his half-brother's portrayal. "I want to make clear that my father was not only a great poet, but a darn good father, and I love him dearly." He said it was true his father was "torn between his muse and his domestic obligations," yet could be fun and affectionate, and never dull.

At the event, Toronto television mogul Moses Znaimer recalled that when Layton was his English teacher at Herzliah High School in the 1950s, on the first day of class he wrote on the blackboard "99 per cent" following by a series of nines. "With a piercing gaze, he said that was the percentage of people who are philistines. We had no idea what that was, but I was determined not to be one," Znaimer said.

Stan Asher, who was a teacher at Herzliah in the 1960s, remembers Layton would peddle his books at school. "He would say he was offering it to me at wholesale prices and promised that one day it would be a collector's item."

Musia Schwartz, a devoted friend to the end, first met Layton when she was a young immigrant from Poland after World War II attending his English class at the Jewish Public Library, along with other survivors. Their horrifying stories inspired some of his poems on the Holocaust.

Layton did not live a conventional Jewish life, but he never severed his association with the community. He was born Israel Lazarovitch in 1912 in Tirgul Neamt, Romania, the youngest of eight children. The family immigrated to Montreal the following year. They were poor; his father was a quiet religious man, his mother – to whom he was strongly attached – was a formidable character.

She believed her youngest was destined for greatness because he was born naturally circumcised.

Books, other than holy ones, were regarded as a frivolity, and Layton only discovered literature during his recuperation from serious burns suffered when a candle set his nightshirt on fire as a boy, according to Donald Winkler's 2003 documentary A Red Carpet for the Sun: The Life of Irving Layton. Layton himself also spoke of a Baron Byng High School teacher as awakening him to the beauty of poetry.

Layton earned a degree in agriculture at Macdonald College in the 1930s and, in a communist phase, toyed with the idea of going to live in the Soviet Union. Instead he joined the Royal Canadian Air Force in 1942.

After the war he was at loose ends, until one day when he was in a cafeteria, in the proverbial blinding flash, he was inspired to write a poem. Grabbing the waitress's pencil, he dashed off The Swimmer in five minutes. Layton was basically self-published through the late 1940s and 1950s. The title of the film by Winkler is taken from the collection that earned Layton a Governor General's Award in 1959.

The advent of television allowed Layton to develop his persona as an iconoclast. He discovered the showman in him, and the power the medium had to make his work known.

He was openly sensual, derided Chrisitianity as "Judaism with a nose job" and embraced Jesus as a fellow Jew. Until then, he had been living a conventional life in Cote St. Luc, raising two children with his second wife Betty Sutherland and teaching school.

He taught at Concordia University (then Sir George Williams) from 1950 to 1964, and returned in 1989 as writer-in-residence for a year. He left the university a massive collection of manuscripts and correspondence, and in 2000, its Institute for Canadian Jewish studies acquired the desk he wrote at.

Institute head Norman Ravvin said at the time it was a perfect place for it because of Layton's impact on younger Canadian Jewish writers and his "staking out [of] an outspokenly Jewish poetic voice that helped put Canadian poetry on the map."

Concordia awarded him an honorary doctorate in 1976, the same year he was named an Officer of the Order of Canada. He also received honorary degrees from Bishop's and York University, and was a professor of English at the Toronto school from 1969 to 1978

Family friend and occasional visitor Rikee Madoff said that the day before he died, Layton "looked good, his face smooth and calm." He sat beside the piano as she played old Yiddish songs for him.

Community honours school's founding teacher

By WILF GEROFSKY
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — One woman's determination to give her children an education that would help shape them as proud Jews in a child-centred learning environment led to the establishment of Hamilton's Kehila Day School almost seven years ago.

Julia Kollek's children, Talia and Amiel, were attending Celia Berlin's Temple Playhouse preschool at Temple Anshe Sholom, and Kollek was impressed by the quality of Berlin's teaching style, which Kollek says focused on meeting the children's needs rather than being curriculum centered.

Julia Kollek

She wanted her children to continue to receive this type of education in the early school years and began the process that led to the formation of what she laughingly calls "the little day school that could!"

Kollek spent the next three years talking to parents and community leaders and visiting Jewish day schools in Canada, the United States and Europe. She attended a conference on Jewish education in Atlanta. With Suzie Solnik, another interested parent, she commissioned a professional survey that they paid for themselves. The survey indicated there was enough interest to start a school.

"Kehila was founded as a team effort, and the first board members were amazing," Kollek says.

Although she admits there was plenty of opposition at first, there were dedicated supporters too. Kehila opened in September 1999 in premises leased from Temple Anshe Sholom.

The initial enrolment was five children, which grew to 11 the first year. This year, the school has 30 students from senior kindergarten to Grade 4. About one in four students in Jewish day schools in Hamilton now attend Kehila.

"The name Kehila, meaning community, indicates a key objective of the school, which is to be one that tolerates and accepts all expressions of Judaism and respects the teachings of each," says principal Ariel Zaltzman.

Jewish studies are integrated with the teaching of the core curriculum Zaltzman says. At their Chanukah concert last month, for example, the children sang both traditional songs and songs written for the occasion, in English, Hebrew and French. Jewish content is included in everything studied. The school also has a strong arts program, with professional artists coming to conduct classes in music, art and dance.

The curriculum is child-centered, tailored to the needs of each individual child. If a student excels in math, for instance, he or she is exposed to an enriched math program. An immigrant youngster from Israel who does not speak English will receive English as a second language instruction. Most of the Hebrew teachers have Hebrew as their first language, and the kids pick it up very quickly, Zaltzman says.

The school does not ignore physical needs either. Fridays, the children are bused to the Jewish Community Centre to have phys ed classes in the gym.

So successful have the efforts of those who started up Kehila been that one of school's teachers, Zehava Chaimovitz, was honoured with a Grinspoon-Steinhardt Award for excellence in Jewish education at the assembly of 5,000 Jewish community leaders and educators held last month in Toronto. The Grinspoon-Steinhardt Awards recognize teachers in communities across North America who have made a commitment to the field of Jewish education, honouring outstanding classroom-based teachers.

Zaltzman dreams about a relationship that would spread across the entire spectrum of Jewish life in Hamilton, with an ever-growing enrolment.

"It's all about dreamers. Joseph was a dreamer, Jacob was a dreamer," he reflects. "You've got to be a dreamer."

MILITARY EXHIBIT NOW OPEN: More than 30 Jewish war veterans were on hand last month for the launch of a new exhibit titled "For King and Country: The Jewish Canadian Military Experience." The exhibit, an initiative of the UJA Federation Ontario Jewish Archives, will be on display on the fourth floor of the Lipa Green Building for the coming year. [Eve Marks photo]

Mtl. community welcomes immigration uptick

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The Montreal Jewish community's efforts to stem its three-decade-long demographic decline by promoting immigration are showing encouraging results, says Victor Goldbloom, the new president of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Montreal (JIAS)

The numbers are well below the optimistic forecast in 2002 by FEDERATION CJA officials that as many as 10,000 Jews might come to Quebec over the next couple of years, largely as a consequence of the economic collapse in Argentina and a rash of anti-Semitic events in France.

But with a current caseload of close to 2,600 individuals, JIAS is busier than it has been in recent memory. This figure includes both those who have arrived here in the past two years and are receiving services from the agency, and those who are in the immigration process, and, for the most part, still living abroad, but receiving support from JIAS. During 2005 alone, more than 600 JIAS clients settled here.

While the number of Jews coming from Argentina has tapered off, France is an increasingly important source of immigrants.

Argentine immigration peaked in 2003, when 644 individuals arrived or were being processed. In 2004, the figure was 594 and, this past year, 463. By contrast, only 76 Argentines were on the JIAS caseload in 2001.

The number of French Jews has almost tripled in the same period. In 2003, the agency had 206 clients from France (again, either arrived or finalizing their immigration papers). In 2004, that increased to 430 and, for the year just ended, to 582. In 2001, JIAS had just 58 French clients.

Goldbloom notes that the actual number of Jews coming here from France may be as much as 50 per cent higher. Many are believed not to be seeking the services of JIAS, because of economic independence or familiarity with Quebec's language and culture. A number are thought to be university students who decide to stay, attracted by career opportunities.

"We have set out in recent months to try to communicate with people who come on their own. They may have financial resources, but still need some help in resettlement, and we would like them to be an active part of the community," Goldbloom said.

On the other hand, virtually all of the Argentines are seen by JIAS, he said, even though most are well-educated and middle class. Finding employment for them has been a challenge because of the professional corporations' limited recognition of foreign credentials, a matter the Jewish community has taken up with the Quebec government.

Re-qualifying is not always a viable option. "It's not easy, for example, to find a residency at a hospital," he said.

The slowdown in immigration from Argentina is likely due to the easing of the economic crisis there since the election of a new government under President Nestor Kirchner in 2003, Goldbloom said.

"Our sense, however, is that the improvement has not entirely done away with the anxiety Jews have about their future there," he said.

Goldbloom stressed that the evidence indicates that those who have settled here are not telling family and friends back in Argentina not to follow them.

"They are saying very positive things about the way they were helped by JIAS, which starts with meeting them at the airport," he said.

The largest single source of Jewish immigrants to Montreal remains the former Soviet Union. More than 700 clients (both here and expected to soon arrive) are from these countries, but Goldbloom points out that most are family-reunification cases and they are older on average than the Argentine and French newcomers.

JIAS is also handling about 350 immigrants from Israel. Goldbloom said a substantial proportion of them came to Israel from elsewhere, most commonly the former Soviet Union, "but all along had wanted to come to North America."

Overall, about 540 JIAS clients are children under age 18, a boon to an aging community.

Heading the community's immigration agency is the latest challenge for the 82-year-old Goldbloom, a doctor by profession who served as a Liberal MNA from 1966 to 1979 and as Quebec's first Jewish cabinet minister.

He was then CEO of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, and served as Canada's Commissioner of Official Languages from 1991 to 1999.

In the past few years, he chaired the federation's now-disbanded task force on immigration, established by former president Steven Cummings, who made reversing the population slide a priority of his tenure.

Goldbloom will be called upon to use the tact and even-handedness he is known for. In wooing prospective immigrants, JIAS has to avoid appearing to be doing two things: robbing Israel of olim, and contributing to the decline of another Jewish community.

All Jews approaching JIAS are asked if they have considered Israel as a destination.

"Aliyah has to be No. 1. We do not want to compete with that. But if people are questioning the wisdom of staying where they are and have a made a choice not to go to Israel, we want to make them aware of our willingness to welcome them. What we can't be is aggressive or predatory," Goldbloom said. Loss of members has been more of an issue for the much smaller Argentine community than it has been for France, where there are about 600,000 Jews.

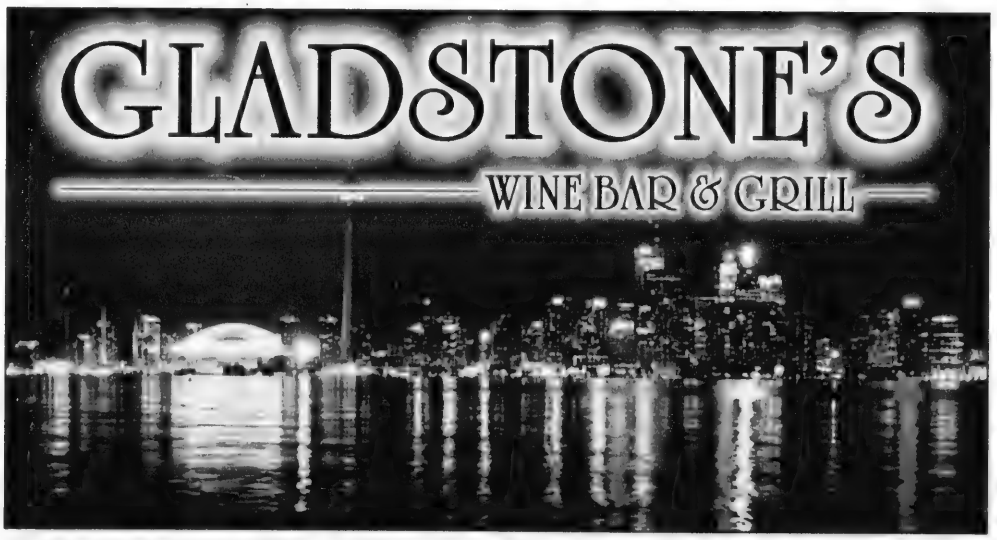
Gladstone's elevates Kosher cuisine to an art form



If you're seeking the kind of "uplift" that makes your palate sing, Gladstone's Wine Bar & Grill is certainly the place to visit. For upscale dining experiences in an exquisite, ultrachic ambience, Gladstone's has become the prime destination of discerning restaurant-goers and celebrants from all over Toronto and beyond.

After honing his craft for many years in a variety of prestigious venues, including a lengthy stint as the exclusive Kosher caterer at Beth Jacob Congregation in Los Angeles, founder Raphy Amar sees in Gladstone's the fulfillment of a vision: Glatt Kosher cuisine on a grand scale in a midtown venue that's accessible to everyone. At Gladstone's, the same Amar signature cuisine you may have enjoyed at a recent wedding or Bar Mitzvah is yours to experience on a daily basis.

In developing and nurturing his ever-growing clientele, Amar has reaped the benefit of an obsessive attention to detail. "Nobody's perfect," he grins, "but in this business, you almost have to be. If everything — and I mean everything — isn't just right, then I'm not in a comfort zone. The presentation has to be worthy of an art gallery. It has to look too good to eat. Then it has to taste beyond perfect; it has to transport you to another place. The service has to be impeccable. The atmosphere has to be elegant and down to earth at the same time, which I feel I've been able to achieve at Gladstone's. I always tell my staff, no detail is too small. Whether you are catering a wedding for several hundred or serving an intimate dinner for two, you must be at your very best every night."

Gladstone's world-class international cuisine, wine list, beverage menu, and dessert selection are a natural extension of Amar's ongoing catering activities through Beverly Hills Caterers. "It's an incredible privilege to be able to serve others, both on a daily basis and for the milestone events in their lives."

JIAS has full-time rep in Buenos Aires

"When we first went to Argentina, we were concerned we might be resented by the local community. We have tried to be particularly respectful and not do anything without the knowledge of the community leaders."

The Quebec government has been encouraging Latin American immigration and the Argentines' applications are being handled in an "efficient" three months, allowing arrival here within one to two years, he said.

JIAS has a full-time representative in Buenos Aires, a position it intends to keep for the time being. "A year from now, we will review the situation," Goldbloom said.

The Buenos Aires representative has also contacted other South American communities, but to date, immigration from outside Argentina has been low, about 130 clients currently.

"We had expected we might get a fair number from Brazil, but that has not materialized," he said.

JIAS has no representative in France, but its staff is going there occasionally and "we have excellent cooperation" with the Quebec delegation in Paris, Goldbloom added.

Whether the upward trend in French immigration will continue is by no means sure because, Goldbloom notes, the French government is taking anti-Semitism more seriously and statistics show incidents are down by about half. "It obviously wants to reassure the Jewish community that it can respond effectively."

Goldbloom has made two visits to Argentina and Brazil. More recently, he also visited France on two occasions, as well as Belgium, although the latter has not been a source of immigrants to date.

JIAS is marketing the quality of Jewish community life in Montreal, highlighting its cohesiveness, institutions and generosity. "One of the first questions the Argentines will ask is if there is a Jewish school they can send their children to," he said.

While Montreal does have a large Jewish day school system, Goldbloom said, not all who want to have been able to enrol their children because of either lack of places or inability to pay.

"Schools plan for their enrolment ahead of time, and when a couple of dozen children come along unexpectedly, they can't say there is a place for them automatically," he said.

Montreal's climate is one thing JIAS cannot do anything about, but it does see that newcomers get warm clothing if they need it, he said.

Despite the obstacles they may face, Goldbloom said he is "impressed with how courageous and patient" the newcomers are.

Language does not appear to be a major issue.

While English tends to be their second language, most Argentines learned some French before they left and are continuing to do so here. JIAS also runs its own language classes.

"I'm impressed by how many can express themselves in French," he said. "I'm not aware of any who have not qualified because their French was not good enough."

The question of whether the recent influx is here for the long term can't be ignored."To the best of our knowledge, very few who have stayed here a while have moved to another place. But obviously, for young people, mobility within Canada or North American is a reality," Goldbloom said.

Quebec's attractiveness to Jewish immigrants may also dim if the Parti Québécois wins the next provincial election and holds another referendum on sovereignty, a fact the Montreal Jewish community must also take into account.

For Dryden, Mostyn, it's déjà vu all over again

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As the election campaign neared the half-way mark, Conservative leader Stephen Harper announced he had narrowed his focus to five key issues, the better to distinguish his party's priorities from those of the Liberals. Among the five is child care, where the Tories have staked out a let-the-parent-decide approach with a $1,200 per child taxable grant.

York Centre Liberal candidate Ken Dryden is happy to contrast his party's position with that of the Conservatives. As minister of social development, he had crafted the Liberals' child-care policy and pushed it at every opportunity, signing agreements to implement it with 10 provinces. He is certain the party's goal of a national, non-profit day-care system is what the public wants. His Conservative opponent, Michael Mostyn, believes his party's alternative better answers parents' and their children's needs.

It is an issues that should resonate in York Centre, a riding bounded primarily by Highway 401 to the south, Jane Street and Keele Street to the west, the west branch of the Don River on the east and Steeles Avenue to the north. There are a lot of kids in the riding, Dryden said, and the Liberal approach is one that better provides the early childhood education that is needed. Once taxed even at modest income levels, the Conservatives' $1,200 grant amounts to closer to $900 and "it's not a voucher. It need not be spent on child care."

Mostyn responds by noting the money ($1 billion per year) pledged by the Liberal government to support provincially run day-care programs would not help the less than 25 per cent of families that used day care, "nor allow for choices."

How does the Liberal plan help Jewish parents who value a Jewish education for their children? he asks. The Tory proposal "makes it easier to get a Jewish education or Jewish day care. That's what Jewish parents want to hear," he added.

For Dryden and Mostyn, competing for votes in York Centre is a case of déjà vu all over again. The two last tangled in the 2004 election, won by Dryden by a commanding 11,000 votes. The Tories have not held York Centre since 1958-62, when John Diefenbaker's Conservatives formed the government in Ottawa. Since then, it's been a Liberal stronghold, though Mostyn suggests the 2004 tally indicates he is making inroads on the Liberal stranglehold. The Liberal margin of victory, though large, was less than in the days when Art Eggleton used to beat his Tory opponents by 20,000 or more votes, Mostyn said. In 2004, Dryden won the riding with 21,520 votes, or 54.8 per cent of the ballots cast. Mostyn was second with 10,318 votes (26.3 per cent). NDP candidate Peter Flaherty finished third with 5,376 votes (13.7 per cent). This year's NDP candidate is Marco Iacampo, a 25-year-old policy assistant to City Councillor Maria Augimeri.

At 25 per cent of the riding's electorate, the Jewish community is a rich source of votes. In addition to the Jewish component, there are sizeable Italian and Hispanic communities as well.

All candidates agree that the sponsorship scandal still resonates in the riding. "The fact has sunk in that there's a culture of corruption" in the governing Liberal party, Mostyn said.

A lawyer by profession and a graduate of Jewish day schools, Mostyn said the Gomery report, along with a general sense that "it's time for a change," often comes up when he stumps for votes. So, too, are issues of gun violence and the inadequate recognition of foreign credentials for recent immigrants – a big issue in a riding with a sizeable population of highly educated new Canadians.

"This federal government has not pushed enough to get regulatory agencies to accept foreign credentials," he said.

Dryden acknowledges the sponsorship scandal remains an issue, as has Canada's UN voting record. He points out that Justice John Gomery cleared Prime Minister Paul Martin, but even so, "nobody has paid a bigger price than the prime minister."

The political atmosphere has been poisoned, and "nobody has a bigger stake to make sure it does not happen again," he said.

Dryden said in his 17 months in Ottawa, he's seen how the sponsorship scandal has dominated other issues. "That can seem like the show. It isn't the show."

Instead, he points to developments like the health-care agreement, which will see $41 billion allocated to the provinces over 10 years, along with increased federal support for cities and the early childhood learning initiative.

Mostyn said the Conservatives have been advancing their own policy initiatives, key among them a tougher approach to gun violence. He suggested the Liberals' proposed handgun ban is mere window dressing, since, subject to some exceptions, "handguns have been banned in this country since 1934."

The Tories would address Canada's "revolving door justice system," which sees suspects released quickly only to commit further crimes. Tougher sentencing is required in the short term, along with long-term programs to deal with youths at risk, he said.

Dryden believes gun control is part of a solution, but he's not convinced that tougher sentencing would have any appreciable effect on crime.

"It's probably a small part of the answer," he said, as is the handgun ban. "Largely, the story is one of opportunity or not. When people don't find it [they]'ll find it in another way."

Iacampo, who said he is focusing on local issues in the campaign, said Dryden "has been missing in action" when it comes to neighbourhood issues.

The federal government "has not stepped forward to give youth activities to keep them away from drugs and guns," he said.

A candidate for the first time, Iacampo said he is running to give himself name recognition. The first issue he mentions is the future of the Downsview lands. Plans for a park have been percolating for 12 years and still nothing has been done, he said.

Dryden said that on Dec. 8, the cabinet approved transfer of the lands from the Department of National Defence to a crown corporation and the corporation board will determine the mix of parkland and other developments that will support the park financially.

On the international front, Mostyn said many of the riding's voters are "upset with our UN voting record towards Israel." Despite promises that Canada would shift its votes, there has been only one vote shift, Mostyn asserted. What's more, Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew laid a memorial wreath at Yasser Arafat's grave while declining to attend a memorial for former U.S. President Ronald Reagan.

Dryden, who visited Israel last February, maintains Canada has shifted its UN votes on six resolutions.

He said he has told people in government that the differences between our stated policy and "our votes on some of these resolutions is incomprehensible… The wording is unhelpful, the wording is destructive."

He said he has pushed for changes to Canada's UN votes.

Iacampo acknowledged the Mideast conflict "is a very complicated matter… I think the best role Canada can play is to support any initiative that opens a discourse to peace."

Voting record on Israel at UN comes under fire

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

While describing Canada's United Nations voting record on matters relating to Israel as "middle of the road," Richmond Hill Liberal MP Bryon Wilfert notes there has been somewhat of a shift in voting recently.

"We've always tried to have a middle-of-the-road course," said Wilfert, the incumbent for this riding north of Toronto, which is about six per cent Jewish.

"This year, we changed a few votes."

In December, Canada shifted its vote from previous years on three United Nations resolutions at the world body's annual session on the Question of Palestine. Canada went on to vote against Israel on seven other resolutions.

But Wilfert's main opponent, veteran Richmond Hill city councillor Joe Di Paola, who is running for the Conservatives, said a few vote shifts don't go far enough.

Richmond Hill Liberal attacked on health care

"I think the Liberal record voting at the UN is dismal when it comes to Israel," said Di Paola, noting Canada voted against Israel a total of 11 times at the UN.

"There's a lot of rhetoric from the Liberal party, a lot of talk about being friends with Israel, but it's just not the case in action, especially when it comes to voting at the UN."

The riding of Richmond Hill is bordered by Highway 7 in the south and Gamble Road, Yonge Street and Elgin Mills Road East in the north. The east-west boundaries are Highway 404 and Bathurst Street.

Wilfert, himself a former Richmond Hill municipal councillor, has won three consecutive terms. In the 2004 election, he received 27,102 votes, more than double the Conservatives and far ahead of the New Democratic Party's 4,495 votes.

In addition to Di Paola, Wilfert is squaring off against first-time NDP candidate Wess Dowsett and Tim Rudkins of the Green Party.

Wilfert was quick to laud anti-terror legislation introduced by the Liberals.

"Since 9/11, we brought in Bill C-35, anti-terror legislation, which has now been reviewed [and is] providing significantly more dollars to the public security minister in terms of support for everything from… airports to border security," he said.

Dowsett, a negotiator for the United Steelworkers Union, rated current security measures as "fair."

"Issues have been exposed about a lack of security at airports," he said, adding that an audit would be in order to assess how effective security practices are and to outline suggested improvements.

As for the hot-button issue of funding Catholic schools but not other faith-based schools, Wilfert said it's a provincial matter and did not offer a view.

"It would be inappropriate for Ottawa to dictate to Queen's Park on that issue," he said.

But the other candidates did share their perspectives.

Di Paola recalled that a few years ago, the provincial Conservatives in Ontario introduced legislation that offered tax credits to parents who pay for their child's tuition for faith-based schooling. The Equity in Education Tax Credit was repealed by the Liberals.

"Determination of education [lies] with the provinces, but we will empower them to make decisions like that – giving tax credits," he said. "It's something that at the federal level we would be supportive of."

Dowsett said the present situation is unfair, though he does not support public funding for faith-based schools.

"On a personal note, I think it's wrong that one particular group should be treated differently than another," he said.

"Any education program outside of the publicly funded system that involved private funding is welcome in our society… But I don't think any of it should be funded by public money."

With respect to children in day care, vastly different funding policies are being suggested by the parties.

The Conservatives have pledged to provide parents with $1,200 yearly per child under the age of six to be used for childcare expenses.

The Liberals are emphasizing creating more spaces in day care, as are the NDP.

"We're going to put money directly in the hands of parents for them to determine which way they can best care for their children," said Di Paola.

Wilfert noted money won't benefit parents if the spaces aren't available.

"If you get money, but no spaces are available, it doesn't matter how much money you get," he said.

Dowsett agreed with the space argument, but said the Liberals have failed to act on it.

"It's odd that the Liberals take that position now," he said. "They've been making those promises for 12 years and haven't delivered on them. We'll actually do it."

The candidates for the opposition parties were quick to jump on the cuts the federal Liberals have made to health-care transfer payments to the provinces.

"Everybody remembers the massive cuts in transfer payments," Dowsett pointed out. "The first step is to stop the growth of private care… so we need a vehicle to track where federal dollars are going in this system."

Wilfert downplays the cuts, shifting the blame to the provinces.

"It's not the amount of money you spend – it's how you spend it," he said, trumpeting the recent agreement the federal government reached with the provinces to set benchmarks for wait times.

Di Paola also favours cutting wait times and speaks of making Canada's health-care system a world leader.

"The Conservative party has announced guaranteed patient wait times for each surgical procedure," he said.

"It comes as a price tag to do that, but we will make that commitment… so that we can once again be the number one health-care provider in the world."

Jewish MP Neville working hard for third term

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Anita Neville, the Liberal member of Parliament for Winnipeg South Centre, says she is working hard on this election campaign despite having done well in the last one.

Neville is the only Jewish MP from Manitoba and the only Jewish candidate in the province. She is the parliamentary secretary to the minister of Canadian Heritage, Liza Frulla, who is also the minister responsible for Status of Women Canada.

Neville has represented Winnipeg South Centre since 2000. The riding has the largest number of Jewish voters in the city. According to a 2001 census, there are about 7,600 Jewish residents in Crescentwood, River Heights and Tuxedo – the areas that comprise much of Winnipeg South Centre.

Neville says she has been a strong advocate for Israel and Jewish causes. She co-chairs Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel and has been involved in the drive to have Israel's Magen David Adom accepted into the International Red Cross organization and the effort to keep Al Jazeera broadcasts out of Canada.

"We have tried to make the appropriate members of the government aware of Jewish issues," she says. "And we have helped organize bilateral meetings between our government ministers and their Israeli counterparts, which have led to some joint initiatives between our two countries."

As for election issues, Neville reports that what she is hearing most frequently from voters is that they are angry about having an election at this time of year.

That is not the same message that her Conservative opponent, Michael Richards, is hearing. Richards, a lawyer running for office for the first time, says voters are telling him that they are concerned about government accountability. They are also talking about health care and the need for safer streets.

"My sense is that Jewish voters in the riding take a greater interest in the issues than the average voter," he says.

He says he hopes that after 12 years of Liberal government, the voters in Winnipeg South Centre are ready to vote for change.

Mark Wasyliw, the riding's New Democratic Party candidate, is also running for office for the first time. And like Richards, he is a lawyer.

He says he decided to run because he has seen, through his legal practice, the deterioration in society in the last few years and felt compelled to take action.

"Voters in this riding are disappointed in Anita Neville," he says.

"They were spoiled by having [former foreign minister] Lloyd Axworthy as their MP before. They also feel this government is tired, and they are upset about the government's priorities."

On issues related to Israel, Wasyliw says his major influence has been Abe Arnold, who is a leading Jewish left-wing critic of Israel. "While the wall seems to be successful in reducing the level of violence, it can't bring peace," he says.

Although the NDP candidate ran third last time in the affluent riding, Wasyliw says he hopes enough people who vote NDP provincially and Liberal federally there may back his candidacy this time.

The riding of Kildonan-St. Paul, which includes most of north Winnipeg on both sides of the Red River, is the only other riding in Winnipeg with a sizable Jewish population. Garden City, on the west side of the river, was reported to have a Jewish population of 2,535 in the 2001 census – with another 1,200 Jewish residents elsewhere in the riding west of the river.

Kildonan-St. Paul was traditionally a Liberal/NDP stronghold until the riding's boundaries were changed. Before the last federal election in 2004, Kildonan-St. Paul was split and the eastern portion merged with a more Conservative area east of the river and retained the name Kildonan-St. Paul. For many years, the district – known as Winnipeg North – was represented by the late Jewish NDP MP David Orlikow. He was defeated in 1988 by Rey Pagtakhan, who held the seat for the next 16 years.

In the last election, Pagtakhan ran in the western half of the riding, Winnipeg North, and lost to NDPer Judy Wasylycia-Leis.

In the last election, Kildonan-St. Paul voted Conservative in a tight race. Joy Smith, a former member of the Manitoba Legislative Assembly, finished with 275 more votes than her Liberal opponent, former city council and mayoralty candidate Terry Duguid. The two are back for a return bout.

Smith believes she is in a strong position in the race. "I have been working very hard since the last election," she says. "People appreciate my hard work."

She says infrastructure needs to be improved and crime combated. She mentioned voters' remarks about the Gomery Commission findings and spoke about day care.

She says she has spoken out against Iran and the Iranian president's threats against Israel in Parliament. "My father was a World War II veteran. We can't let another Holocaust happen. The president of Iran's comments should not be tolerated."

Smith says she is a strong supporter of the Canadian Human Rights Museum, the brainchild of the late Israel Asper, which is to be built in Winnipeg.

Duguid got off to a late start in the last campaign. He says that he actually won the vote on election day but lost in the advance polls. He is hoping to win this time out.

Duguid has been involved in the Canadian Human Rights Museum's fundraising campaign and has worked with the Jewish National Fund on several initiatives, including recently concluded agreements between the JNF and the governments of Alberta and Manitoba for sharing expertise on water issues.

The NDP candidate in Kildonan-St. Paul, school trustee Evelyn Myskiw, is making her first federal run, and says she is giving it an all-out effort.

She says what she is hearing from voters are concerns about health care, child care, education and poverty. She notes that she is largely hearing concerns about health care from Jewish voters in the area since a high percentage of them are seniors.

Election 2006

Candidates square off in multi-ethnic Willowdale

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Running for his seventh term in nine elections, Willowdale's incumbent MP, Liberal Jim Peterson, says he is hoping to continue his agenda of building Canada's economy by investing in education and training.

"The major thing we have to do as the federal government is to ensure the ongoing prosperity of Canada. Right now, we have the best economy in the G7 countries," Peterson told The CJN, adding that as the minister of international trade, he budgeted $20 million to increase trade with four countries, one of them Israel.

In the 2004 election, Peterson garnered 61 per cent of the vote, defeating Conservative Jovan Boseovski, who is running again this year. Peterson's competition also includes Rochelle Carnegie of the New Democratic Party, who is running in her first election, and Sharolyn Vettese of the Green Party, who ran in the riding in 2004.

Although the riding's boundaries were revised in 2004, Willowdale still contains many affluent residential areas, and the average family income is $81,664.

The riding is bounded roughly by Highway 401 and the West Don River in the south; Steeles Avenue East in the north; Yonge and Bathurst streets in the west; and Leslie Street in the east, with a northeastern chunk extending as far as Victoria Park Avenue.

The 2001 census found that Chinese-Canadians comprise about 27 per cent of the riding's population, with substantial Korean and Iranian communities, and a Jewish community that both Peterson and Boseovski estimate at five per cent of the population.

Peterson, a lawyer who has also worked as an educator and a businessman, acknowledged the rise in anti-Semitic and racist incidents in Canada. He said those who commit hate crimes have to be prosecuted and need to be educated.

"It requires more work from faith-based groups working with each other… because we can't tolerate this," Peterson said, adding that he would like to see multicultural education become a part of the curriculum.

Boseovski, a corporate sales executive with the World Trade Group, said anti-Semitic incidents are not taken seriously enough.

He believes in tougher sentences for those involved in incidents such as the bombing of United Talmud Torahs school in Montreal in 2004.

Carnegie, the daughter of hockey legend Herb Carriegie, said that as a black woman, she carries the issue of racism "very close to her heart" and feels the government should take a more proactive approach to hate crime.

"There is a long history in Canada of anti-Semitism and racism. We need more education, more programs in schools to teach young people that everyone is the same. The people in charge don't take it seriously enough."

While each candidate agreed that more needs to be done to combat racism, opinions differed on Canada's votes at the United Nations on resolutions regarding Israel.

"There are a number of resolutions that were anti-Israel in an unfair way," Peterson said, adding that he is proud to be a part of a Liberal parliamentary group that reviewed anti-Israel votes and pressed for their revision. Canada changed its vote on three of them late last year.

Boseovski agreed that Canada needs to consider that Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East, and he said "we should be more supportive of the democratic countries in the world."

Carnegie said Canada should ensure that international laws are observed for both Israelis and Palestinians.

"We believe Canada should play a leading role in working for justice and peace in the Middle East. We believe in an end to the Israeli occupation of Palestine and the killing of innocent civilians."

Peterson said he personally supports public funding for faith-based schools, but he called the issue a provincial matter.

Boseovski agreed that equalization is the best option, and suggested that offering tax credits to parents who choose to send their children to private school is a possible solution.

Carnegie said the emphasis should be on an inclusive public school system, which would help combat anti-Semitism and racism.

Other issues which strike a chord with voters are health care and child care. Peterson said the Liberals have pumped billions of dollars into both. As long as provinces back the National Health Accord, which is slated to put $41 billion into health care over 10 years, the system will improve, he added.

Peterson said he is also "delighted" that Ottawa has signed deals with 10 provinces to transfer $5 billion over five years to improve child care.

Boseovski said the Tories want a fully public system that follows the Canada Health Act. He said his party would give families $1,200 annually for every child under six, giving parents the option to spend the money as they see fit on child care.

As a single mother, Carnegie said she understands the importance of a properly functioning child care system, but she disagrees with the Conservatives' approach.

"I don't think that $1,200 a year, which translates to [less than] $4 a day, is going to help a family."

She favours a national care strategy, similar to the one in Quebec, which places high standards on the qualification of workers, and offers 180,000 subsidized spaces.

Reisman shares secrets for permanent weight loss

By NORENE GILLETZ

January is always a difficult month, with cold, wintery weather and trying to lose those extra pounds brought on by holiday splurges. Weight loss and living a healthier lifestyle are always at the top of the list of most people's New Year's resolutions.

Rose Reisman, author of 14 best-selling cookbooks, believes that "only real and permanent lifestyle changes lead to positive changes in our health and well-being." Her newest book, Rose Reisman's Secrets for Permanent Weight Loss (Whitecap Books) is packed with practical information, scrumptious recipes and terrific tips to help you develop a healthier lifestyle for 2006 and beyond.

Whether you prefer a lower-fat, lower-carb or lower-calorie eating program, her nine easy-to-follow principles can work with any eating plan. Reisman says, "I've battled weight issues my entire life, and only by using these nine practices have I been able to maintain my weight. I feel younger, look better and know I'm healthier. It really works!"

Reisman will teach you how to set realistic goals, incorporate a healthy diet and exercise into your everyday routine and develop a support network for your lifestyle change. She shares the pros and cons of current fad diets and explains why quick fix plans never result in permanent weight loss.

She proves that eating right is also eating well. Her two-week diet plan with menu and recipe suggestions will help get you on the right track to good health. She offers 150 recipes for tempting dishes such as Salmon Fillet with Soy-Maple Syrup Glaze (recipe below), Broccoli with Creamy Goat Cheese Sauce and Cream Cheese-Filled Brownies.

Recipes include a nutritional analysis and are excellent for family or guests. Although not all recipes are kosher, you'll find lots of "food for thought" in this excellent resource. Here are some comfort foods to brighten up a cold wintery day. Enjoy!

GREEN AND YELLOW SPLIT PEA SOUP

There has never been a better comfort soup than split green pea. Reisman has many versions of this traditional soup in past cookbooks, so she combined both green and yellow split peas for this one. The flavours are amazing and the texture is smooth as cream.

2 tsp. vegetable oil
1 cup chopped onion
1 cup chopped carrot
1 cup chopped celery
2 tsp. minced garlic
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
5 cups vegetable stock
1 cup diced peeled potatoes
½ cup dried yellow split peas
½ cup dried green split peas
⅛ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. freshly ground black pepper

Garnish:
¼ cup finely chopped green onions
¼ cup lower-fat plain yogurt

In a nonstick saucepan sprayed with vegetable spray, heat the oil over medium-high heat. Cook the onion, carrot, celery and garlic for 8 minutes or until the vegetables are softened and starting to brown. Stir in the mustard, stock, potatoes, yellow split peas, green split peas, salt and pepper. Bring to a boil. Reduce the heat to medium-low, cover and cook for 30 to 35 minutes or until the split peas are tender.

Puree the soup, in batches if necessary, in a blender or food processor. Garnish with green onions and a dollop of yogurt. Serves 6.

SALMON FILLET WITH SOY-MAPLE SYRUP GLAZE

This simple glaze is so delicious, Reisman often has to make more to satisfy her guests. If you make it in advance, it will quickly become thick and sticky, but just reheat it to loosen it again. You can also grill your salmon skin side up. After you turn the fish, spoon some glaze over the top.

1½ lb. salmon fillets (4)

Soy-Maple Syrup Glaze:
¼ cup low-sodium soy sauce
¼ cup pure maple syrup
1 tbsp. cornstarch

Garnish:
2 tsp. sesame seeds
3 tbsp. chopped cilantro or parsley

Preheat oven to 425. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper.

Combine the soy sauce, maple syrup and cornstarch in a small skillet. Bring to a boil and simmer on medium heat for 2 minutes or until thickened and syrupy.

Spoon 3 tbsp. of the glaze over the top of the fish. Bake for 10 minutes per inch. Garnish with sesame seeds and cilantro. Reheat the remaining glaze and drizzle overtop the salmon. Serves 4.

PEANUT BUTTER AND JAM MUFFINS

You can't find a better combination than peanut butter and jam. Always use natural peanut butter, containing peanuts only. The other types often contain hydrogenated vegetable oil and icing sugar. If there's any allergy to peanuts, look for other nut butters or try soy butter.

1 large ripe banana, mashed (about ½ cup)
3 tbsp. smooth peanut butter
1 large egg
½ cup low-fat milk
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
¼ cup all-purpose flour
⅓ cup whole wheat flour
¼ cup Splenda
1½ tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. baking soda
⅛ tsp. salt
3 tbsp. raspberry jam

Preheat oven to 350. Spray 12 muffin cups with vegetable spray.

In a large bowl and using a whisk or electric beaters, combine the banana, peanut butter, egg, milk, oil and vanilla.

In another bowl, stir together both flours, the Splenda, baking powder, cinnamon, baking soda and salt with a wooden spoon. Stir the dry mixture into the banana mixture just until everything is combined. Divide the mixture among the prepared muffin cups. Dollop a small amount of jam on top of each muffin.

Bake for about 12 minutes or until a tester inserted in the middle of a muffin comes out clean. Makes 12 muffins.

The region: moving apart

By BARRY RUBIN

Opinion

The world is about to reconsider the way it views the Arab-Israeli conflict, as a result of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's past policy shift, his probable departure from politics and recent developments in the Palestinian Authority (PA).

The critical variable here is not what has happened to Sharon, but rather a Palestinian political situation that makes any progress toward peace impossible for years to come. Sharon's illness may be distracting attention from the Palestinian crisis, but it is ultimately much less important in shaping the region's future.

The immediate question is whether the current Palestinian leadership will find some excuse to cancel the planned Jan. 25 parliamentary elections, grasping at such straws as Israel's handling of voting in Jerusalem or Sharon's medical problems. But even this issue is secondary.

Whether the Palestinians go to the polls or not, the PA is rushing headlong back to the past. Both Hamas and the new Fatah leaders headed by Marwan Barghouti, are, under slightly different guises, returning to the strategies of the young Yasser Arafat. The fact that these strategies failed for four decades does not seem to be a factor in their calculations.

For Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, things have gone so far that the only group who still think he counts for anything is the western media. His four pillars of support – Muhammad Dahlan, in charge of security; Abu Abbas, bureaucracy; Tayib Abd al-Rahim, administration; and Salam Fayyad, economy – have all deserted him. He is powerless, passive and clueless.

Abbas has good reason to worry about the election: both Hamas (under the charming slogan "change and reform") and the Fatah rebels headed by Barghouti will do as well as or better than Abbas' candidates.

Since the Abbas list includes many of the rebels, almost half of those elected by voters who want to choose Abbas could end up totally opposed to him.

Smaller radical lists, including both nationalist extremists and independent Islamist groups, will also get a considerable number of seats.

The Palestinian election commission resigned over government interference in the campaign, and it is likely that the actual balloting will be chaotic and marked by violence.

The violence has already started. There are daily reports of Palestinians and visiting western supporters being kidnapped for money; shootings – Fatah activists killed a Hamas man hanging up campaign posters in Gaza; and takeovers of government buildings by armed men, among other incidents.

None of this will change for a very long time. Indeed, the only way to re-establish peace would be by force.There is no group or leader on the horizon who could impose order, and at any rate, doing so would require an even higher level of violence.

But the single most remarkable event was a Jan. 4 armed attack by Fatah on the Egyptian army. To prevent Egypt's having any control over the Egypt-Gaza Strip border, Fatah gunmen killed two Egyptian soldiers and wounded 30, forcing that country's troops to withdraw. They then knocked a hole in the border fence allowing Palestinians to pass through at will.

This action was also taken to protest the arrest of a Fatah commander who was kidnapping foreigners. Naturally, the man was quickly released by the hapless Palestinian authorities.

The kind of thing Fatah gunmen did to the Egyptians is generally called an act of war. Of course, in the context of Arab politics, Egypt will do nothing for now except to publicly praise Abbas for the way he supposedly handled the crisis. This event shows how ridiculous it is to expect Egypt to do anything to safeguard this border or prevent terrorists and arms from crossing it.

At the same time, however, such incidents are another step in the developing alienation of the Arab world from the Palestinians. The Egyptians may say nice things about the Palestinian cause, but they are boiling mad and their anger will manifest itself in the future. No Arab state will give the Palestinians serious economic support. And as Hamas comes to parity with Fatah – and perhaps goes beyond it – this alienation will deepen.

The West is far more likely to misunderstand these developments than is the Arab world. There are three main dangers in the inevitable reassessment:

- insistence, flying in the face of reality, that Abbas is a viable leader, a moderate who should be helped by more concessions;
- wishful thinking that Barghouti is the new "man of peace" who will lead the Palestinians toward compromise even though his whole strategy revolves around terrorism. It should also be noted that Barghouti is more co-ordinator than leader. For example, his main ally in the Gaza Strip, Dahlan, is also one of his most bitter rivals.
- a nonsensical belief that Hamas can be moderated, a concept that makes the appeasement of Nazi Germany in the 1930s look reasonable by comparison.

It is time to face the facts. Sharon continued to move Israel toward moderation and a readiness for compromise while the Palestinians have gone in the opposite direction, increasing hatred of Israel, intransigence and terrorism with the goal of total victory.

The two sides are going to continue moving further apart in future.

PA leaders say they fear for peace process

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
The Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Many Palestinians last week responded with ill-disguised glee to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's stroke, while senior Palestinian officials expressed fear his illness might set back the peace process and that his replacement might be even "worse."

Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas, who returned to Ramallah after a week-long tour of the Persian Gulf region, was said to be following news of Sharon's condition with "great worry." His spokesperson said Abbas had phoned Israeli officials for updates.

Abbas expressed fear Sharon's absence from the scene would have a negative impact on the peace process. He also expressed hope that the latest developments in Israel wouldn't affect the Palestinians' plan to hold parliamentary elections later this month.

"On a purely humanitarian level, we feel sorry for Mr. Sharon," said Palestinian Deputy Prime Minister Nabil Shaath.

"Politically, it will increase the uncertainty we are facing to get back to the peace process," he said. "It is highly unpredictable to tell what will happen."

But prominent Palestinian spokesperson Hanan Ashrawi denounced Sharon as "a strong and charismatic leader who steered politics toward the right and extremism."

PA Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, who met with Sharon several times over the past few years, expressed hope that Sharon's departure would not leave a political vacuum in Israel.

"What we care about is a serious peace process," he said. "We are looking forward to dealing with a new Israeli leadership that believes in peace with the Palestinians."

"His death will cause a political upheaval in both Israeli and Palestinian societies," former PA minister Muhammad Dahlan said.

He hailed Sharon as a leader who was loyal to his people, saying: "We wish him what the Israeli people wish him."

"Sharon's absence removes from the political scene a professional killer who mastered the murder of Palestinians and addressed the most violent, brutal and bloody strikes [against Arabs] in the history of the Arab-Israeli struggle," said Muhammad Nazzal, a Hamas leader in Beirut. "The Palestinian people can only hope that what is coming is better, not worse."

In Gaza City, Hamas spokesperson Mushi al-Masri said his movement believed the region would be better off without Sharon.

"This man has a black history," he said. "He has committed many massacres against our people and was responsible for the death of [Hamas leader] Ahmed Yassin and [former PA president] Yasser Arafat."

Ahmed Jibril, leader of the Syrian-backed faction Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command, called Sharon's stroke a gift from God.

"We say it frankly that God is great and is able to exact revenge on this butcher. We thank God for this gift he presented to us on this new year," Jibril said.

Many Palestinians said they were happy to see the end of Sharon.

"I hate the man. I hope he dies slowly," said one young man helping the Fatah campaign for the upcoming parliamentary election.

"This is a great day for the Palestinians," said university student Sawsan Hamoudeh. "We hope the Israeli people will now elect better leaders."

Elsewhere, Palestinians handed out sweets in celebration, while gunmen in Balata refugee camp in Nablus took to the streets, firing their weapons in joy.

Palestinian commentator Ghazi al-Saadi struck a more pragmatic tone, noting that Sharon was "the first Israeli leader who stopped claiming Israel had a right to all of the Palestinians' land," a reference to Israel's recent withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and Sharon's clear description of Israel's hold on the West Bank as "occupation."

"A live Sharon is better for the Palestinians now, despite all the crimes he has committed against us," al-Saadi said.

Sharon's condition improving

By JUDY SIEGEL-ITZKOVICH
The Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon began to breathe on his own Monday morning, after doctors started gradually reducing his coma-inducing medications.

Hadassah Ein Kerem hospital director Shlomo Mor-Yosef said Monday that Sharon was still attached to a ventilator and that the process of weaning Sharon from sedation could take hours or days.

He added that this is just one of many expected changes in the prime minister's condition and that updates would not be forthcoming for every small change.

"I want to reiterate and emphasize that the prime minister's condition is still serious," Mor-Yosef said.

Early Monday morning, Sharon's doctors had decided to bring him out of his induced coma, following a consultation in which they reviewed Sharon's condition. It was expected that only after Sharon woke up could his motor and cognitive capabilities be assessed. The doctors planned to assess the response of the prime minister's pupils to light, as well as his response to pain stimuli. The latter will be done by applying pressure to his hand or chest.

On Sunday, a computerized tomography (CT) scan showed that his intracranial pressure has decreased and other vital signs have remained steady.

Mor-Yosef reported that Sharon had no fever, which is a positive sign indicating he was not suffering from infection, despite the hole that was drilled in his skull to perform the three brain operations he has undergone.

"I can't yet say that the prime minister is out of danger, but there are slight signs of an improvement. The field of neurosurgery works at a slower pace than trauma or other disciplines that journalists deal with," said Mor-Yosef, asking for patience. "We are fighting to save his life."

The chances that Sharon will survive his massive stroke are "very high. He is a very strong man, and he is getting the best care," Jose Cohen, the neurosurgeon who has performed three operations on Sharon, said on Saturday.

Cohen warned, however, that the prime minister remained in serious condition, and noted: "He will not continue to be prime minister, but maybe he will be able to understand and to speak."

A protracted induced coma usually does not cause patients harm, said Amos Korczyn, a leading clinical and research neurologist at Tel Aviv's Sourasky Medical Center and at Tel Aviv University's Sackler Medical Faculty.

"The wake-up process," he said, "is gradual, as dosages of anesthetic drugs are reduced. When a patient regains consciousness, there is usually disquiet, and the patient may resist, especially because of being attached to a respirator. Then he can be given tranquilizers."

When the patient is awake, reflexes are tested and he is asked to move his limbs. Cognitive ability is measured by his reactions when he is spoken to. If he can't speak, he can nod, open and close his eyelids or write his responses.

"It is rare for such patients to have a complete recovery. We've all heard of miracles, but these don't often occur," Korczyn said.

The left hemisphere of the brain is called the dominant hemisphere – even in left-handers – and the right hemisphere is the non-dominant one. Sharon's strokes caused damage to his right brain, according to Hadassah neurologists.

"It has other functions than the left hemisphere," Korczyn said. "It has direct or indirect control on emotions. When we speak, we have intonations that enable people to assess the speaker's mood even when he uses a language they don't understand, like Chinese. But if a certain part of the right hemisphere is damaged, this is lost, and the speech is atonal."

He added that a stroke victim with right-brain damage may lose his body image and be unable to dress himself. There may also be partial paralysis, with difficulty walking or total paralysis on the left side. There is usually no vision or hearing problem, unless the back part of the brain was damaged, in which case the victim can lose half of his field of vision in both eyes. Speech resides in the left hemisphere, while memory is seated in both hemispheres. People with damage on the left side can see and read letters, but they may not be able to understand what the words say.

Some parts of the brain are doubled, thanks to evolution, so if one part is harmed the patient can sometimes relearn abilities and tasks up to a certain point, especially if he is younger and his brain has a higher degree of plasticity, Korczyn said.

Asked what message Sharon's stroke should have for the public, Korczyn said, "I would like the public to learn from it and adapt the lesson to their own lives. Adopt healthful lifestyles. If you are obese, lose weight by exercising and following a beneficial diet. The prime minister, fortunately, did not smoke. Get tested regularly for hypertension, and, if you have it, get immediate treatment. Reduce stress. Strokes can be prevented."

Quarter of Gaza evacuees still lack housing

By TOVAH LAZAROFF
The Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Five months since they were evacuated from their Gaza homes this summer, 25 per cent of the former residents are still living in hotel rooms, dormitories and tents, according to a report released Sunday by the nonprofit group Lema'an Acheinu, which has been assisting the evacuees.

The report paints a grim picture of the evacuees' economic, emotional and family situations, including drug and alcohol use by teenagers and an increase in divorce rates.

According to the report, more than 50 per cent have yet to receive any compensation funds and only 5.7 per cent of the 2,100 people who lost their jobs have found new ones.

The Disengagement Authority, however, disputes some of the figures. A thousand families have received 75 or 100 per cent of the funds due to them and another 500 were given advances, while some 200 families have yet to receive any money, said an Authority spokesperson.

He added that many of those in the hotels are waiting for their temporary homes to be built. Most evacuee families expect they will have to live in temporary homes for two years while they wait for their permanent ones to be constructed.

Early show of support for Olmert

But he received an early show of support with a weekend phone call from U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

There was also an internal reprieve from the Likud party, which decided against resigning from the government, reversing a decision made before Sharon suffered his stroke last week. "Now is not the time for such moves," Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, one of four cabinet members from Likud, told Army Radio.

A Channel 10 television survey issued after Sharon took ill predicted that his new centrist party, Kadima, would take 40 of the Knesset's 120 seats in the election if it is led by Olmert.

But analysts suggested the showing reflected short-term public sympathy. Ha'aretz's political correspondent, Aluf Ben, recalled the aftermath of former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination in 1995, when opinion polls showed his successor, Shimon Peres, to be the clear favourite for re-election, only to be proven wrong by Benjamin Netanyahu's landslide win. "Instead of presenting himself as pressing ahead with Rabin's path, Peres made the mistake of insisting that he was an autonomous candidate," Ben said, suggesting Olmert was wise to play Sharon's reluctant stand-in.

Yet the Channel 10 survey found that Peres, should he lead Kadima, would perform better than Olmert, taking 42 Knesset seats.

Though Peres quit the Labor party last year to back Sharon, he has yet to formally join Kadima. But he voiced support for Olmert. "He supported the policies of Mr. Sharon and even occasionally was ahead of him," Peres told Britain's Sky television. "The policies for peace, the continuation of the policies of Sharon, will have my full support."

Halutz speaks of Iran's nukes

By HERB KEINON
The Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — IDF Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz said last week that Iran's nuclear program "can be destroyed."

Halutz made the comments during a conference at Tel Aviv University, Army Radio reported.

Israeli officials and politicians have openly discussed the possibility of an attack on Iran, either alone or with other countries, aimed at crippling Iran's nuclear development capabilities.

Meanwhile, Israel's Foreign Ministry responded to Iran's decision last week to resume nuclear fuel production research by issuing a statement saying "it is clear that this step calls for a grave and immediate international response – sending the issue to the [United Nations] Security Council."

The statement said such a move would "send a clear message that the international community will not reconcile with Iran's breaching its commitments."

According to the Foreign Ministry, Iran – by announcing its decision last week to resume its nuclear research and development – has rejected the international community's efforts to co-operate with it.

Iran's decision to resume unspecified research into nuclear fuel production – excluding, for the time being, the enrichment of uranium – was announced by a top Iranian nuclear official on state television.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, said Iran's nuclear program had suffered significantly from having suspended its research over the past 2½ years, and he said his organization could no longer keep its scientists from proceeding.

Saeedi did not say what kind of nuclear fuel research Iran was planning to resume, but he said it did not include uranium enrichment.

The announcement was certain to raise further concerns in the United States and among its European allies who believe Iran is moving toward production of nuclear weapons. Tehran says the program is for electricity generation.

In Vienna, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, said the agency knew of the decision and added it was important that Tehran "maintains its suspension of all enrichment-related activity" as a way of reducing international suspicions about its nuclear plans.

ElBaradei also called on Iran to "build confidence and enable the resumption of dialogue with all concerned parties."

The Iranian mission to the IAEA told the agency that Iran "has decided to resume from 9 February 2006… [research and development] on the peaceful nuclear energy program which has been suspended," ElBaradei told the IAEA's 35 board member nations in a restricted document made available to Associated Press.

A European diplomat accredited to the agency said it was too early to evaluate the significance of Iran's move and whether it would scuttle talks planned for later this month between Iran and France, Britain and Germany on behalf of the European Union.

The EU has previously said that any decision by Iran to resume work on its uranium enrichment program would be "the red line" that would mean an end to European attempts to negotiate differences with Iran over its nuclear program and would revive EU attempts to have Iran taken before the UN Security Council for violating the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

But the diplomat, who demanded anonymity in exchange for discussing EU strategy, said the Europeans would want to have details of what precisely Iran wanted to do before making a decision on future talks.

The West has long opposed Iran's enrichment of uranium because the process can produce fuel for atomic weapons, but Saeedi said the research now planned was not of that type.

"The research in this field will have little to do with the production of nuclear fuel," Saeedi said, adding, as the ElBaradei document confirmed, that Iran planned to keep the IAEA informed.

Iran has come under heavy international pressure from the IAEA, the UN's nuclear watchdog, as well as the West to abandon its program to produce fuel for its Russian-built nuclear reactor, which is due to come on stream this year, and for its future nuclear power plants.

Iran has vowed it will never give up its right under the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty to enrich uranium and produce nuclear fuel inside the country.

Technology trumps terror

By ERIK SCHECHTER
The Jerusalem Post

TEL AVIV — Military technology developed over the last five years has played a key role in the successes against Palestinian terrorism, said Israel Defence Forces Chief of the General Staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz.

"Terrorism today is at 10 percent of the level it was in 2002 – 10 per cent in terms of the number of suicide bombers, the number of their successes and the number of victims," Halutz said.

The reason: technological improvements in the gathering and processing of real-time intelligence have made the IDF a more effective fighting force despite a 25 per cent cut in matériel.

Halutz spoke at a conference on military research and development held at Tel Aviv University last week, where he listed terrorism as the number 1 priority of the IDF in the coming years.

"Fighting on the open desert is relatively simple," he said. "But we are dealing with crowded, inhabited areas, which, because we are a country with values and morality, leaves us with many restrictions."

Throwing down a challenge to military industry professionals in the audience, Halutz said the IDF needs the ability not just to identify but also hit an enemy in a matter of seconds without hurting innocent bystanders.

Following terrorism in the order of IDF concerns is the development of enemy rockets and missiles, from the primitive Qassam to the long-range Shihab-3.

Halutz said that, in dealing with these threats, the military would have to strengthen its defensive capabilities.

"Israel will still have an offensive military doctrine, but we need to improve our defense," he said. "The legitimacy of offensive action – and we are part of an international community of norms – is on the decline."

Halutz said the last threat that the IDF may have to contend with was that of an outright clash with an enemy army. Accordingly, Israel must maintain its edge in intelligence and air power.

"The chances of [a conventional war] occurring are low, in fact very low," said Halutz. "But if we are not ready for it, it will happen. That's the paradox."

Perhaps preaching to the choir, Halutz told the audience that a domestic military industry was critical to the national interest, alluding to past rows with the United States over the reselling of American technology to other countries.

"We need our independence," said Halutz.

He said that the country leads, and must expand its lead, in developing remotely piloted vehicles, electronic warfare and night-vision technology.

"We stopped developing jet fighters in this country. I thought it was a mistake to abandon the Lavi [jet fighter]," he said.

Halutz noted that there was pressure to stop producing the Merkava. He criticized proponents of the cut as confusing the necessity of the tank itself with the country's need to retain the ability to produce armoured vehicles.

Hamas talks possible, Mofaz says

Israel's defence minister said negotiations with Hamas could happen if the Islamic terrorist group disarms. Shaul Mofaz's remarks were made in the run-up to Palestinian Authority parliamentary elections in which Hamas is expected to make significant gains. "If Hamas is elected, it will have to disarm, to recognize Israel's right to exist, to become a political body," Mofaz said in a speech. "Only then will the basic conditions be created, if they are created, for a future dialogue." Hamas refuses to disarm, but its leaders have hinted that the faction's charter, calling for Israel's destruction, could be amended if future conditions are right.

Funding scandal resurfaces

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's family is suspected of receiving $3 million (US) in illicit foreign funds. Police confirmed last week that an investigation is under way into allegations that Austrian magnates funnelled the money to the Sharon family, perhaps to help pay off contributions to Sharon's 1999 run to head the Likud Party. But there was no indication Sharon himself might be implicated, and media reports said the new probe could take months or even years to complete, well after the March 28 general elections are over. The prime minister has constantly denied any wrongdoing in the campaign-funding case, in which no charges were pursued against him. Sharon's eldest son, Omri, pleaded guilty to related charges and faces sentencing later this month.

Holocaust fund short on cash

An Israeli fund for Holocaust survivors announced it lacked funds to continue assisting some of the neediest survivors. Officials with the Foundation for the Benefit of Holocaust Victims blamed the Claims Conference for not providing additional funding to cover the increasing medical needs of aging survivors. The Claims Conference funds the majority of the needs, but has not answered its request for an additional $10 million that would cover two programs in question, the foundation said. The Claims Conference said it has increased its funding to the foundation every year since it was founded and expects to give it $40 million in 2006. Wolf Factor, an Auschwitz survivor who heads the fund, said more money needs to be channelled to needy Holocaust survivors instead of going to youth education and other projects. "The Claims Conference finances most of the foundation's budget, but the priorities in distribution of that budget are completely illogical," he said.

Zaka dives deep

Zaka, the volunteer Israeli emergency response society, has launched a new underwater unit. Two dozen amateur divers turned out for their first practice outing on behalf of Zaka, which gained fame in recent years for its cleanup work at the sites of terrorist attacks and traffic accidents. The divers will be on call to search for Israelis lost at sea. Unlike the main Zaka group, made up mostly of religious men, the diver unit is predominantly secular and includes women.

Donors shy on PA money

International donors are refusing to provide funds to the Palestinian Authority. The refusal, which is based on violations of the PA's commitments not to increase salaries in the public sector and the resignation of the PA's finance minister, Salam Fayyad, will lead to a $950 million (US) deficit for the Palestinians in 2006, the Israeli newspaper Globes reported. The Palestinian Authority's deficit for 2005 is expected to be less than $480 million, Globes said.

Former Forest Hill Collegiate student directs CSI

By HARRISON JORDAN
Special to The CJN

Harrison Jordan

You may not have heard his name before, but you have definitely heard the name of the show that he produces and directs.

The show is CSI: Crime Scene Investigation, and Richard Lewis is one of the main directors as well as a supervising producer and a writer for the show.

Lewis, who is from Toronto, started making films here.

"I remember when I was about 14 years old, I made my first Super 8 movie at Forest Hill Collegiate in Mrs. Bird's class. My first film was an adaptation of Edgar Allan Poe's The Tell-Tale Heart," Lewis said.

Lewis' career began on the small screen, directing for the television series Alfred Hitchcock Presents and Superboy, which were both presented on American network TV. He then directed the made-in-Canada movie Whale Music.

"William Peterson, the lead actor and executive producer (of CSI), saw this movie that I had made (Whale Music), and he quite liked it," Lewis said.

Richard Lewis

But before Lewis was given the chance to become a director for CSI, Paul Haggis, the Oscar-nominated screenwriter who wrote the movies Million Dollar Baby and Crash and created the TV show Due South, asked him to direct an episode of Due South.

Lewis then moved to Los Angeles, where Haggis asked him to direct a few episodes for Michael Hayes and Family Law, two other shows that Haggis developed. Lewis went on to direct Falcone, a television show about an undercover FBI agent. Like most of the shows Lewis had directed, Falcone was made for CBS.

"Along with getting noticed by William Peterson, I was one of CBS's favourite directors, so they brought me on the show to direct the fourth episode of CSI. CBS liked how the episode was directed, so I went on to direct an episode later on in the first season, and eventually I was asked to become a producer and main director," Lewis said.

Although his contract with CBS for CSI ends at the end of next season, he will be kept busy with other projects.

"I have a feature film in development, and I have a pilot show deal with CBS, along with a new show I will be making this winter," Lewis said.

He still has ties to Toronto as his parents, his wife, his sister and his stepsons live here. "I spend a lot of time with [my family and relatives in Toronto], so I'm back and forth quite a lot," he said.

Harrison Jordan, 13, is a student at Crestwood Preparatory College in Toronto.

ALMOST TWINS?

Scores of eager participants took part in a contest last week in Tel Aviv to find the dog that most looks like its owner. Contestants were judged by resemblances of the face, body, clothing and posture. At left is the winning pair: Ever and his year-and-a-half old pug named Gandhi. Runners-up were, at right, Hadas and her 10-year-old mixed collie and German shepherd Killer, and 75-year-old Eve, below, with her chihuahua Feathers.

SNOWBALLS

"Come out and play," the snow seemed to beg, and that's exactly what Aaron planned on doing. Maybe he would go sledding with his friends, Zach and Nathan. Or better yet, they could have a snowball fight. That winter, they'd already had three amazing snowball fights, which would have continued all night if their parents hadn't made them stop. Nathan was the best, relentlessly pelting both his opponents with a ceaseless onslaught of stinging ice. He was so good that Aaron usually had to team up with Zach just to stand a chance against him.

Aaron was still staring dreamily out the window when he noticed someone coming. It was Nathan! And slightly behind him, Zach! Wow, thought Aaron, perfect timing! He waved to Nathan, who waved back. He was about to wave to Zach too, but before he had a chance to, Zach put his finger over his lips. Nathan must not know Zach was right behind him, Aaron realized, and Zach was to surprise him. This was going to be great.

Stealthily, Zach closed the gap between himself and Nathan. Then he pounced, sending Nathan sprawling face down in the snow, taken completely by surprise. Nathan groped around, trying to find his glasses, and Zach, without wasting a second, launched Phase II of the attack. Not even bothering to make snowballs, he scooped up huge clumps of snow and dumped them onto his hapless victim. Through the closed window, Aaron could hear Nathan's vociferous protests. "What in the world do you think you're doing? Stop it!" but Zach continued to heave snow at him. Abruptly, Nathan spun around, glasses in hand, and launched himself at Zach. Zach slipped and fell, and Nathan reached into Zach's parka with one hand, and began shovelling snow down his back with the other. Aaron watched in shock. This wasn't a play fight anymore. This was real.

Zach shoved Nathan away and the two of them lay there, glaring at each other wordlessly. Then Nathan jumped up, shook the snow off himself, and ran home crying. Zach watched until he disappeared from view before getting up. He took a few steps toward Aaron's house, hesitated, and turned around to go home, leaving behind only the kicked up snow as evidence of the fight. Aaron, his day ruined, just stared.

The next day in school, Zach and Nathan completely ignored each other. Aaron hoped that they would make up, but they didn't. And by lunch, even though they usually ate together, they sat at opposite ends of the table. The only person they talked to was Aaron, separately of course.

Aaron desperately wanted to see the fight end, but he didn't know what to do. And then he remembered what he had learned about his namesake, Aaron the High Priest.

What would Aaron the High Priest do? When he saw two people in an argument, he would call each of them aside, and say, "The person you are in a fight with told me how he regrets everything and wishes to make up." When the two would meet, they would hug each other and become friends again.*

Well, it was worth a shot. He tried talking to Zach first. It took awhile, but finally Zach confessed, "I wasn't trying to get him upset. He loves fighting in the snow. The truth is, I was surprised when he got so upset at me…I wish the whole thing had never happened."

"So why don't you tell him that?"

"I can't. Not now."

After school, Aaron spoke to Nathan. "Look, I understand you're really angry at Zach, but you should know that he wasn't trying to get you upset. He thought you would love a sudden snowball fight."

"Not like what he did! He knocked me over, almost broke my glasses. I don't know what he was thinking!"

"I'm not saying that he's right for what he did. I just wanted to tell you that he told me he's sorry about the whole thing and he didn't mean anything bad."

Nathan didn't respond, and Aaron, feeling very awkward, went home.

He was just finishing his homework when his mother told him, "Aaron, your friends are here. They want to go sledding."

My friends? Friends? Aaron threw on his winter coat and gloves and raced down the stairs and out the door, where Nathan and Zach were waiting with the sled.

"Yo Aaron, think fast!" called Nathan, sending a sudden snowball at him. Aaron jumped to the side, and the snowball exploded on the wall behind him. Aaron quickly scooped up some snow, packed it together, and counterattacked. Within seconds, the yard was filled with hurtling snowballs, the sled all but forgotten. And Aaron Cohen, descendant of Aaron the High Priest, pursuer of peace, unleashed a barrage of snow and ice at those who dared defy him.

Hollywood gossip columnist Louella Parsons a celebrity herself

The First Lady of Hollywood by Samantha Barbas, University of California Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Hollywood era ended quietly 34 years ago with the death of gossip columnist Louella Parsons. At the height of her powers in the 1950s, she commanded a readership of 40 million in 1,200 newspapers in the United States and elsewhere, a record that may never be surpassed.

Samantha Barbas

Celebrities feared her, readers loved her and movie studio presidents deferred to her. The thrice-married Parsons was probably the single most influential journalist of her times.

Parsons, who was of Jewish origin, is the subject of Samantha Barbas' biography, The First Lady of Hollywood, an absorbing book about celebrity culture and Hollywood power politics. Running to 417 pages, it is a pleasing amalgam of rigorous scholarship and popular history. It will appeal to a wide range of readers.

A cultural icon who nourished her readers' romance with celebrity, Parsons was the undisputed queen of Hollywood gossip. Her competitors – Hedda Hopper, Sheilah Graham, Bob Thomas, Sidney Skolsky, Erskine Johnson and Aline Mosby – tried hard to emulate her.

She was born in Freeport, Ill., a thriving business and industrial centre 100 miles east of Chicago that had been settled by German and Irish immigrants in the 19th century.

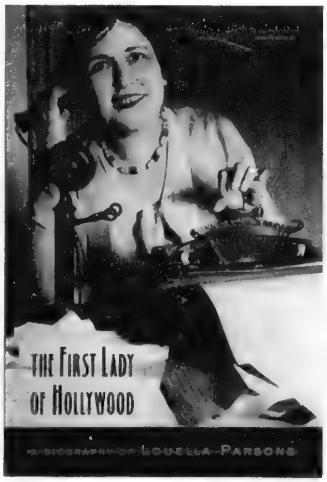
Her mother, Helen, was the daughter of Issac Stine, a German Jew from Wurtemberg who immigrated to the United States in 1847. Stine's wife, Jeanette Wilcox, was Irish.

Helen Stine married Joshua Oettinger, an assimilated German Jew from Danville, Pennsylvania, in 1881. He was one of Freeport's most prosperous businessmen. They had five children, all of whom were raised as Christians.

The Oettingers, one of the few nominally Jewish families in Freeport, were respected and well thought of, according to Barbas.

By all accounts, Parsons was a bright, articulate and intellectually curious teenager who, like her mother, was fascinated by the theatre. "Louella grew up during a transition in American women's history, when the passive, corseted, mid-century Victorian feminine ideal, characterized by sexual purity and domesticity, was slowly being challenged by the more modern and independent 'new woman' who sought greater opportunities outside the home," Barbas observes.

At 19, she was hired by a local newspaper to write for the "society page." Weddings, engagements and formal dinners were her beat. It whetted her appetite for journalism.



Like many Americans, Parsons was smitten by the new, budding film industry. She read fan magazines and developed crushes on actors. She also submitted unsolicited scripts to film studios in Chicago. All were rejected.

In 1911, a studio hired her as its chief scenario editor. That led to a position as a feature writer and motion picture columnist for a Chicago daily. Parsons boasted that she was the first movie gossip writer in the nation. Qualifying Parsons' claim, Barbas acknowledges that her column, Seen on the Screen, was the first daily one exclusively devoted to cinema.

Despite her popularity as a columnist, Parsons' talent was continually denigrated. Ben Hecht, the Chicago reporter who would become a Hollywood screenwriter himself, called her "the worst reporter the town ever knew," while Walter Winchell, the syndicated columnist, described her as a small-town hack.

Barbas does not regard these withering critiques seriously. As she puts it: "Louella's work was far more intelligent and competent than her critics gave her credit for." She adds that Parsons was a workaholic and an accomplished film reviewer.

In 1918, she moved to the Morning Telegraph, a Chicago daily with a well-deserved reputation for yellow journalism. There Parsons churned out a film column titled In and Out of Focus. This brought her into contact with the principal movie celebrities of the age: Douglas Fairbanks, Mary Pickford, Gloria Swanson, D.W. Griffith, Harold Lloyd, Cecil B. DeMille, Rudolph Valentino and Charlie Chaplin.

Barbas suggests that the turning point of her career occurred when media magnate William Randolph Hearst hired her as a movie columnist for the New York American. The newspaper was staffed, by among others, the celebrated sports writer Damon Runyon and the novelist Nat Ferber. She established a close but obsequious professional relationship with the star-struck Hearst, who ordered editors not to tamper with her copy.

In 1926, she accepted Hearst's offer to be motion picture editor of the Universal News Service and film writer at the Los Angeles Examiner at the then princely salary of $350 a week. Obsessively devoted to her craft, she worked 16-hour days.

Parsons arrived in Hollywood at a time when Jewish movie moguls and producers were still the objects of anti-Semitic attacks from nativists who claimed that Jews controlled American culture.

Although Parsons did not openly identify herself as a Jew, she nonetheless spoke out against anti-Semitism and informed studio bosses Louis B. Mayer, Jack Warner and Harry Cohn when she encountered actors with marked anti-Jewish attitudes.

Parsons had no real competition until Hedda Hopper, a stately blond who had been an actress, appeared on the scene to give her a run for her money. Barbas says that Hopper was an anti-Semite, but she does not substantiate her claim. One wonders how Hopper could have survived in Hollywood with such views.

Being Hearst's lap dog, Parsons unfailingly fought his battles. Relentlessly attacking Citizen Kane, the brilliant film directed by boy wonder Orson Welles, she carped that its malevolent chief character was modelled after Hearst. It was not one of her shining moments.

By the mid-1950s, Parsons had lost ground to Hopper. Her sugar-coated approach to the stars was no longer in vogue. Her health failed her, and she was in almost constant pain, suffering from colds and other bronchial ailments.

Parsons' readership dropped precipitously, and only 70 newspapers carried her column in 1962. By contrast, Hopper's column appeared in 130 newspapers.

After breaking a hip in 1964, she retired. Her chief assistant, Dorothy Manners, took over. Hopper, Parsons' nemesis, died two years later.

Parsons passed away on Dec. 9, 1972 at a convalescent home in Brentwood, a fashionable neighbourhood in Los Angeles. She was 91. Her funeral was attended by only a handful of celebrities, including Bob Hope and Jack Benny.

When she died, her influence was on the wane. But as Barbas correctly comments, Parsons' legacy lives on in the culture of celebrity and the public fascination with gossip.

Cantor blends Ashkenazi and Sephardi rhythms

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The musical soul and dynamic voice of Cantor Aaron Bensoussan fuse together two stirring styles.

One is the up-tempo rhythms and inflections of the Sephardim; the other is the passionate, somewhat mournful spirit of eastern European Jewry.

Bensoussan's singing repertoire is therefore especially diverse and, he admits, rather unique.

"After mastering the Ashkenazi way of singing, I started to incorporate some of the Sephardi motifs into the Ashkenazi prayers," says Bensoussan, a Moroccan émigré who has been the cantor at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue for six years. "This gives it a unique blend."

The multicultural range Bensoussan showcases in his singing is very much in line with his own personal beliefs about building bridges between the various groups in the Jewish community.

To that end, Bensoussan and his colleagues from the Dafina Orchestra, which includes non-Jewish musicians originally from Lebanon, will be performing a concert at the newly renovated Gladstone Hotel in Toronto on Jan.15.

The cantor views the concert as both a forum for outreach and exciting entertainment.

"Music is a strong vehicle to bring people from across the Jewish community together," he reflects. "And the Gladstone Hotel is an intimate place... where people don't have to feel they are pressured to be part of a religious ceremony, but are there just to enjoy the music."

The performance will feature Bensoussan's own compositions and offer various styles of music, including Judeo-Moroccan folklore classics, jazz and flamenco.

The chazzan began to hone a sharp ear for music as a child in Mogador, Morocco, a fortified port city now called Essaouira, which once had 25,000 Jews and was a popular vacation spot for numerous celebrities, including rocker Jimi Hendrix and filmmaker Orson Welles.

"I grew up listening to classical Arabic songs... and going to shul and participating in singing," he recalls.

He left Morocco in 1968 at the age of 14 and headed to New York.

In his new country, Bensoussan studied at various yeshivot and was encouraged by his mother to become a rabbi.

But when he was 18, Bensoussan attended a cantorial concert that fascinated him and sparked his interest in his present profession.

"The music that came out of [the cantor's performance] was so spiritual, and that cantorial cry just gets in your kishkah," he says. "So that's where I started to look into [being a cantor]."

Eventually, he enrolled in the Jewish Theological Seminary and dedicated five years to intensive cantorial training.

His mainly Ashkenazi colleagues were thoroughly impressed by the Sephardi style.

"When I first came to the seminary, I was asked to sing something, so I chose to sing Kol Nidrei and some chants from the Torah," he recalls. "That's how I got into [cantorial] school."

In fact, Bensoussan says the instructors were so moved by the Sephardi modes that they ensured he would maintain them.

After 11 years as a cantor at Temple Beth Shalom in Long Island, Bensoussan, wife Phyllis and son Joshua came to Toronto. The family has since grown with the birth of son Yoni, now three years old.

In addition to his cantorial role at Beth Emeth, Bensoussan has recorded eight albums, regularly performs in concerts, including at such venues as the famed Carnegie Hall, and is hoping to build up Dafina, which is in fact the name of a type of Moroccan cuisine similar to cholent, which is traditionally eaten on Shabbat.

Bensoussan explains that the orchestra evolved out of weekly, improvised jams held in his house.

"We experimented with different improvisations and a lot of people started coming to listen," he says. "I picked the name Dafina because it depicts the aroma of so many ingredients cooked slowly over Sabbath, which gives it that special taste which is unique on Shabbat."

For tickets, call 416-633-3838. The show begins at 7:30 p.m. at the Gladstone Hotel, 1214 Queen St. W.

Young author's debut novel garners GG Award nomination

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

After leaving a sheltered life in Toronto, 19-year-old Alice, a first-year McGill University student, has many lessons to learn: how to cook, do her own laundry and lose her virginity.

In Nellcott Is My Darling (Coach House Books), Golda Fried's debut novel, readers either revisit or learn what it's like to be a naive, inexperienced freshman, living on her own for the first time.

The book was nominated as a finalist for this year's Governor General's Award in English fiction, quite the accomplishment for the 33-year-old author from Toronto, now living in North Carolina.

From the start, it is obvious that Alice sees her first year at university as an opportunity to break free from her studious, straight-edge personality and her parents, who didn't allow her to wear makeup in high school, and to act in ways that would make her "mother's mouth drop open in horror."

Alice eventually replaces her best friend from high school, Bethany, "a political science student [who] studied in the science library because it was quieter," with her next-dorm neighbour, Allegra, a moody painter who shops at Value Village and dates much older men.

Alice seems aware of the tendencies that have kept her sheltered and spends more time trying to abandon them, than she does studying.

At a party, Alice approaches a snack table and attempts to fight the voice in her head telling her to stay away from the supposedly germ-infested hummus.

Grade 9 student gains international acclaim as voice of Atomic Betty

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Thornhill actor and singer Tajja Isen, 14, is the voice of Atomic Betty on the animated Teletoon show of the same name.

Although the show is only in its second year, Tajja, a Grade 9 student at Westmount Collegiate, has already won an international award for her portrayal of Atomic Betty, who lives to right the galaxy from wrong. She went to Los Angeles last April to pick up the Young Artist Award for best performance in a voice role.

Created by Atomic Cartoons and co-produced by Toronto's Breakthrough Films & Television and France's Teleimages Kids, the program has been so successful that the merchandising has taken off. Atomic Betty's handlers have licensed everything from watches to baby's furnishings, cake decorations and dolls.

Just released is an Atomic Betty CD featuring Tajja's singing. All the songs on the album were written by Atomic Betty executive producer Kevin Gillis and his writing partner, Jack Lenz.

"Tajja Isen is an extremely gifted performer whose talents shine through... and we are incredibly proud to work with this rising young talent," Gillis says.

The producers recognized Tajja's singing ability, and aware that Tajja can promote the show and the show can promote Tajja's budding career, they have encouraged her to come out from behind her character and perform for television audiences as herself. She was recently in England and Atlanta, Ga., singing the Atomic Betty theme song on kids' television programs on networks that air the show. Atomic Betty airs in 120 countries.

Her next trip is to Washington, D.C., in early 2006 for an interview for XM Radio, a satellite network.

"It is very exciting, I'm definitely honoured that Kevin is taking an interest in bringing me away from the cartoon," Tajja says. "We have plans to do a Tajja album next. We also did two music videos that were a lot of fun. It was my first performing and dancing around on camera, so I was a little nervous. On the first video, for the theme song, I got to perform with a band – live. The first video was done half live and half animation. The second video, for the song Alien Ball, is done mostly live. It's a love story between me and an alien puppet from the show called Dingleberry."

A few months ago, Breakthrough and Spank Films followed Tajja around, filming a day in the life of the girl behind the voice of Atomic Betty. The piece will appear in an upcoming Atomic Betty DVD.

English kids cheer on Tajja Isen.

Tajja also plays piano and recently wowed a roomful of people at the Atomic Betty record release party by singing while playing an Alicia Keys tune. She would like to tour with a band some day.

She says she would like to act again, both on stage and in television and movies. "I would love to do more stage, especially Broadway and London's West End, but there haven't been a lot of opportunities for me yet

I think mostly because of the age barrier. I'm not old enough to do a lot of that stuff."

Tajja lives with her father Jordie, a chiropractor, mother Karen, and siblings Joshua, 10, Nissae, 8, and Koebe, 5. Joshua has done some voiceovers, and Nissae's voice is on Miss BG on TVOntario and will be heard on Captain Flamingo this February on YTV.

Tajja's past animated shows and specials have included the role of Sister Bear in Berenstain Bears, and performances in Heidi, Braceface, Franny's Feet, Jacob Two Two and Zoe Kezako. For the upcoming Jane and the Dragon, produced by Nelvana and based on the British book series, Tajja was required to put on an English accent. At age 11, she played Young Nala onstage in the Toronto production of the Lion King and garnered an Equity Emerging Artist Award nomination.

Book is a lesson on life and love

"Alice really wanted some food but was scared of having hummus as it was a communal dipping bowl. She wanted to get over this fear. She didn't want to be pristine. She grabbed a wedge of pita, dipped it in and brought it up to her mouth. She imagined cold sores blossoming on her lips."

Her innocence and paranoia always manage to shine through regardless of her efforts.

For instance, as she and Rally, a fellow film-society member, walk home from the party discussing Alice's meeting with Nellcott, a grungy, 23-year-old record-store employee who asked her on a date, she asks, "What's going to happen to me, Rally? Is this guy going to make me pregnant and drop out of university?"

Despite her fears that Nellcott has "had loads of sex, for sure," Alice is hopeful that he will understand that she didn't want to have sex in high school so she could study, get into a good university and avoid "bad blood."

It seems as though Alice is more preoccupied about how others will react to her secret, than with the idea of losing her virginity at all. What is never made clear, however, is why she is so reluctant to give it away.

As Alice progresses through her first semester failing Abnormal Psychology, taking up social smoking, going to parties and dating a guy "your parents would be scared of and your friends already were," it is apparent that she is maturing, but not yet an adult.

Although her experiences force her out of her shell, she still imagines the kind of person she wants to be when she grows up, which suggests she is aware that she is in the developmental stage of becoming a woman.

"The Alice in the future would own high-heeled shoes and bras that fit. She would have plants that would not die. She would have a magazine photo of John Cassavetes with his arm around his wife, Gena Rowlands, on the wall. She would wear her glasses just as often as her contacts and even feel semi-sophisticated about it."

But Fried reminds us, with an anti-climactic ending, that perhaps people shouldn't feel rushed to grow up.

This novel is reminiscent of children who spend their entire adolescence waiting to grow up, and when they finally do, they realize that being an adult is not all that it's cracked up to be.

NEW BOOK SPOTLIGHTS OSTRY ART DECO COLLECTION

The Royal Ontario Museum has just published High Style: Masterworks from the Bernard and Sylvia Ostry Collection in the Royal Ontario Museum, an exquisite 148-page coffee-table book that highlights major pieces of primarily Art Deco objects and furniture that the Ostrys have donated to the ROM since 1989.

The Ostrys, both of whom have served Canada with long and distinguished public service careers, focused not only on Art Deco but also two other movements – Arts and Crafts, and Art Nouveau – that spanned the late 19th century through the '30s. They collected furniture, art glass, ceramics, silverware, light fixtures and sculpture made by Auguste Daum, Emile Galle, Louis Majorelle and other celebrated artists.

After their first acquisition, a 1920s Art Deco suite of bedroom furniture, their collection grew quickly. Soon Bernard Ostry's various pieces "overwhelmed his living quarters and began to spill over into his office," author Alastair Duncan writes, adding that he made the first of four sizable gifts to the ROM "in part, perhaps, to take back his home."

High Style showcases the best of the collection and demonstrates why it has helped to establish the ROM as a premier North American institution in this area of collecting. It is available in bookstores for $49.95.

Oy Vey! Curious George speaks Yiddish

JTA

Curious George is available in Yiddish. A translation of the classic children's book about the playful monkey was put out by Yiddish House, a New York publisher run by the husband and wife team of Celeste Sollod, a veteran of the publishing industry, and Zackary Sholem Berger, a Yiddishist.

The pair published a Yiddish version of Dr. Seuss' The Cat in the Hat in 2003; astounded by its success, they decided to follow it up with the original George book.

Curious George was created by Hans Rey, whose name appears on the book as H.A. Rey, and his wife, Margret. The Jewish couple fled Paris before the Nazi onslaught with the book's manuscript hidden under their bicycle seats. "It's not just for Yiddish speakers — it's for people who want something fun and Jewish," Sollod said.

George der Naygeriker is available at some Jewish and general bookstores and online at www.yiddishcat.com.

Advocate fights to re-open breastfeeding clinic

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

A local mother who says a world-renowned expert on breastfeeding taught one of her children how to eat is fighting to re-open one of his Toronto-area clinics that was closed recently.

Last month, North York General Hospital shut down a clinic run by Dr. Jack Newman, a Toronto pediatrician who each year helps more than 1,800 mothers learn how to feed their babies.

The facility was the last in a number of local hospital-based clinics run by Newman. Another one at St. Michael's Hospital was closed last spring.

But Thornhill social worker and mother of three Esther Goldstein said Newman provides a unique and vital service for moms who have been discharged from hospital and are tempted to turn to formula if they run into challenges in breastfeeding their newborns.

She said Ontario hospitals have been told by the province to balance their budgets by March, and many are doing so by eliminating out-patient programs such as breastfeeding clinics.

Newman said that more than 90 per cent of Toronto-area moms start out breastfeeding exclusively, but because of lack of support, most don't continue for the minimum six months recommended as essential by the World Health Organization (WHO).

North York General has hired a lactation consultant to identify mothers who may need support after discharge. But Goldstein believes that, with more than 5,000 births annually at the hospital and additional staff training responsibilities, one full-time consultant can't do enough.

As a pediatrician, Newman can accomplish far more than community-based nurses, lactation consultants or support groups, Goldstein said. He drains breast abscesses, corrects infants' tongue problems, and monitors challenging babies, such as those with Down Syndrome.

She also noted that Newman is a guru at helping women and their babies develop a good latch, adding that he's even helped adoptive mothers breastfeed successfully.

Said Goldstein, "He can latch the unlatchable babies."

She has experienced his unique approach first hand. During one visit years ago, he sat with her and her baby for more than an hour.

"He taught this baby how to eat," she said.

Since taking on his clinics' cause with the media, hospitals and government, she's received hundreds of letters with similar stories.

Goldstein said Newman's clinic cost North York General nothing except space.

"They were talking about expanding it," she said, adding she recently met with hospital CEO Bonnie Adamson, but left disappointed.

A hospital spokesperson told The CJN that "we are focusing all our resources on our in-patients… Mothers and babies in the community should go elsewhere in the community."

The spokesperson had no information on how many new mothers would require assistance. "Not all women breastfeed… it's a personal choice."

Newman and his clinic partner, lactation consultant Edith Kernerman, are now operating out of the Canadian College of Naturopathic Medicine, across the street from North York General.

Newman said one of the most serious effects of the clinic closures is his diminished capacity to train physicians and other professionals.

Doctors are a frontline resource for mothers, but Newman said their breastfeeding teaching is "appallingly bad." He said pediatricians as a group are "the biggest problem we have with regard to the undermining of breastfeeding."

Goldstein is also frustrated by North York General's focus on in-patient care. Since most babies sleep for their first day and many mothers are discharged after 24 hours, before they begin producing milk, problems will often arise at home, when mothers are alone and tempted by free formula samples, she said.

She added that breastfeeding is a medical necessity, and that high-tech deliveries, short hospital stays, decreased postpartum support and a generation raised on formula all cost babies the healthy foundation they deserve.

Breastfeeding, Goldstein noted, helps prevent three common infant illnesses: ear infections, gastroenteritis and necrotizing enterocolitis, a potentially fatal bowel disease often found in premature infants.

It also protects against SIDS, meningitis, diabetes, Crohn's, as well as some maternal cancers, Goldstein said.

She said the medical journal the Lancet has called breastfeeding "the most effective method of disease prevention, ranking far above… vaccinations," and that the WHO estimates increased breastfeeding could save up to 1.5 million babies a year.

"Breastfeeding saves the government a bundle of money," Newman said, yet "too many health professionals… simply say to mothers 'It's not working, forget it'… Sometimes fixing the problem is easy, if you know how."

He and Goldstein both derided what they described as the government's short-sighted economic focus.

"Support for breastfeeding in Ontario is pitiful," New man said, adding that his efforts are being subverted by Ontario's Health Ministry.

"The new funding formula for hospitals is the direct cause of the closure of several clinics in Ontario. In trying to save money, they will end up spending more," he said. "It just won't look like it."

But Health Minister George Smitherman has said a 300-page petition he received from Goldstein calling for the clinics to be reopened carries little weight, since the hospitals themselves decided to close them.

"I respect that you had a passionate connection to a health-care provider, but one person does not a program make," he told participants at a Queen's Park "nurse-in" last month.

Goldstein disagreed, noting that Newman is unique and that since his first hospital-based clinic opened in 1984 at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, visitors have come from around the world to study his model, and he lectures around the world.

Newman still bills OHIP for patient visits and never charges for follow-up care – which Goldstein said includes being constantly available by telephone and e-mail – but he fears many mothers won't find their way to his new clinic.

Goldstein is still fighting.

"We need a proper clinic, so that [Newman] can transmit everything he's learned," she said. "This is the health of our kids."

Her campaign is ongoing and she can be reached at savetheclinic@rogers.com.

Cycling trip makes Tour de France look like a jaunt to the mall

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Henry Gold sets out on his 11,000-kilometre biking journey across much of rural Africa, he doesn't worry much about big game animals like lions, rhinos or leopards.

They're not the beasts you've got to worry about, he said.

No, it's the trucks, cars and SUVs in the continent's bigger cities that pose the greatest danger. In fact, he says, it feels safer riding a bike on the dirt roads of central Africa than it does on the streets of Toronto.

Safer, and certainly more exotic.

Every January for the past four years, Gold has led a motley assortment of biking and outdoor afficionados on a four-month epic trek across Africa. They begin at the pyramids in Giza, outside Cairo, and head south to the beaches of Cape Town, South Africa. It's a trip that makes the Tour de France look like a jaunt to Ontario Place and back.

The Tour d'Afrique expedition takes the riders through Egypt, Sudan, Ethiopia, Kenya, Tanzania, Malawi, Zimbabwe (in the past, not this year), Zambia, Botswana, Namibia and South Africa. The vast majority of the trip takes place on dirt roads, though the group does make it into some of the larger cities.

When he sets out on his fourth cross-Africa tour on Jan. 14, he expects 42 riders from 10 countries to start with him at Giza. Another 15 or 20 will join the group en route – an option he introduced by breaking up the trip into three different sections.

In past years, participants included a 19-year-old youth and his 72-year-old grandmother, as well as a retired couple. Some participants are avid racers, while most are like Gold, recreational cyclists who hope to broaden their horizons and enjoy a life experience like no other.

"People do what they feel," said the Czechoslovakia-born Gold. "It's a tremendous feeling of satisfaction to finish the route."

Gold, an engineer by training and an advocate on transportation issues, said flexibility is built into the voyage. The group stops for one or two days after every five or six to just "look around.

"We give people the opportunity to be tourists" at the "amazing" Victoria Falls, on the border between Zimbabwe and Zambia, as well as to rest and recover, he said.

Henry Gold organizing bikes in southern Africa

Because Western tourists on mountain bikes are quite an unusual sight in Africa, "we stick out like a sore thumb," Gold said.

But local Africans are not only in awe, they are by and large very helpful.

"Local people wave you down and offer you food and drink – even money, if you can believe that."

They also can't understand why anyone would want to ride their bicycles such a long distance in Africa. "They ask, 'Why?'" Gold said.

Good question. His answer: the Africa experience is quite unlike anything else the cyclists have experienced.

"You disconnect from the modern world and see how to live simply and enjoy it," he explained. "People get so high, you'd think they spent their time in a five-star hotel."

Cyclists become "self-reliant, confident. It's a tremendous experience because fitness is so high."

What's more, "It's like reverting to a hunter-gatherer state."

Well, not entirely. They are, after all, riding 21st century contraptions with two support vehicles following them all the way, carrying food, water, the cyclists' personal gear, and a nurse.

It's a realistic concession to the difficulties of cycling through Africa. If you had to load each bike with all that gear, including the tents the group uses most nights, it would weigh the bikes down too much and make the journey too difficult, Gold said.

Participants mostly camp in the bush, though when they travel through the larger cities, they can opt to spend a night in a hotel or camp on hotel grounds.

As to personal hygiene issues, people become less shy about it, "because everybody does it," Gold explained delicately.

The daily range varies from a low of 60 to 70 kilometres to 200 kilometres on a busy day – usually in Botswana, where the terrain is flat and the cyclists enjoy a rear wind.

Last July, Gold introduced another cycling option for those who believe the best hunting and gathering is to be done in Europe's finer restaurants and shops.

That trip follows the route of the Orient Express – the fabled train that begins in Paris and snakes its way through 3,690 kilometres in central and eastern Europe before ending in Istanbul, Turkey.

That eight-week cycling trip is more relaxed than the African adventure, Gold explained. Three days of biking are followed by one day of rest. Participants can leave their tents in the support vehicle and opt instead for a night in a hotel.

Unlike the dirt roads in Africa, cyclists can use more than 1,300 kilometres of bike paths in Germany, Austria, Slovakia and Hungary, where they can pedal along the Danube River.

The first Orient Express voyage was "a trip of discovery," Gold said, particularly for Jewish participants. While in Trier, Germany, he visited a monument to the rabbinic sage Rashi, and in many European towns and cities, old Jewish quarters are available to be explored.

The European tour included visits to thermal spas, sharing the road with horse-drawn carts and visits to picturesque villages.

Gold said his adventure cycling business developed out of an idea he had back in the late 1980s and '90s. At the time, he was a member of an NGO involved in African development issues. It was also the time when interest in mountain biking exploded and he thought rugged mountain bikes could provide a viable means of transportation in Africa. What better way to illustrate biking's advantages than to hold a long distance race, he thought.

The idea lay dormant until he revived it a few years ago. Now, he not only operates a viable adventure tour business, but he does so in an ecology-friendly way that suggest there are other ways to travel than with gas-guzzling, pollution-spewing vehicles. On Tour d'Afrique, you, too, can become a hunter-gatherer – if only for a few months.

Baycrest hockey tourney includes hockey legends

As far as shlepper hockey goes, it can't get much better than this: lacing up the skates with the likes of hockey legends Darryl Sittler, Borje Salming, Doug Gilmour or Dale Hawerchuk.

Four hundred or more players will enjoy "the ultimate hockey experience" beginning March 23 when the inaugural Baycrest Pro-Am Hockey Invitational gets under way at the Ice Gardens Arena at York University.

Billed by Baycrest as a "one of a kind event [and] your opportunity to rub elbows and shoulders with some of the great ones," it's also a fundraiser for Alzheimer's research and care at Baycrest.

The 40 participating teams will choose a teammate from among a glittering assortment of NHL and Maple Leaf greats. Potential draftees include Wendel Clark, Mark Napier, Gilbert Perreault and Danny Gare.

Drafting positions will be determined by the amount of dollars raised by each team. The more they raise, the higher they select. Each team is expected to raise a minimum of $25,000.

The tournament begins with a draft party on Thursday evening, March 23, when players draft and meet the NHL legends. Tournament games will be held on March 24 and 25. Each team will consist of between 10 and 17 players and is guaranteed a minimum of two games.

Geared to recreational players ages 35 and up, the teams will be divided into four groups: 35 and older, 40 and up, 45 and older and 55 and up.

Fundraising tips and support will be provided by the Baycrest Foundation. Teams will be set up with a personalized website to help raise money online from friends, family, business associates and others. If teams fail to raise the minimum $25,000 by 5 p.m. on Wednesday March 22, they won't be allowed to participate.

For more information, check out the Pro-Am's website at www.baycrestproam.com.

Election etiquette

Money Matters

Jay Kelman

The saintly Chafetz Chaim, Rav Yisroel Meir Kagan of Radin (d.1933), in his classic work on proper speech ethics, points out that up to 31 Torah prohibitions can be violated by improper speech.

As a general rule, all speech that reflects negatively on others is prohibited, irrespective of the veracity of such negative statements. Unlike western law, where truth is a valid defence against charges of slander and libel, Jewish law specifically prohibits gossip, even if it is true. Telling a lie just increases the severity of the prohibition.

The only exception is made when such information is needed to prevent harm. In these cases, the protection offered to the individual must give way to the broader public good, and revealing the information is not only allowed but becomes mandatory.

Such laws clearly limit, if not eliminate, a person's right to disparage a competitor's product, and they have huge implications for commercial advertising. With rare exceptions, one would be limited to pointing out the advantages of one's own products as opposed to mentioning the defects in the competition's. In fact, the Talmud declares that people who elevate themselves by degrading others lose their share in the world to come. A sobering thought indeed, as it is so much easier to put down others than to elevate ourselves.

Nowhere is "negative advertising" more pronounced than during an election campaign. Unfortunately, negative campaigning works quite well, all too well in fact, and thus the temptation to use or misuse it is too prevalent. Nonetheless, elections are (or at least should be) about the public good, thereby allowing greater "freedom of speech". While comparing and contrasting one's platform to that of one's rivals is the essence of a good campaign, one must ensure that it is policies and not personalities that are discussed. Making personal accusations not only serves no public good – unless there are criminal allegations, in which case legal authorities should investigate and if necessary publicize – it is next to impossible to substantiate them and, more often than not, they are based on opinion not fact.

Even when comparing policies, care must be taken to compare accurately and completely. While one is under no obligation to reveal all aspects of a given platform – provided the platform is not thus distorted – it would be unethical to compare the pluses of one's own plan against the minuses of another.

Here is one example from the current campaign. The Liberal party has promised substantially more money for child care than the Conservative party; however the Conservative plan will benefit many more parents. A claim by the Liberals that they are pledging twice as much as the Conservatives would be misleading and thus in violation of Jewish election laws – if it did not also include a statement to the effect that their plan while offering more benefits offers it to fewer people. If they, understandably, would not want to highlight this point then they must avoid comparing their plan to their opponent's and should rather advertise that they are pledging $10 billion for child care and refrain from comparisons.

Unsubstantiated claims must be avoided. Claiming that a certain policy is not the Canadian way is a meaningless statement if not supported by concrete evidence. All it does is to unfairly portray one's opponent in a negative light without justification. One must instead say that an independent survey of Canadians found that, for example, 62 per cent of people surveyed are opposed to this particular policy. As a slight variation in wording often elicits different responses, it appears that proper ethical behaviour would require full disclosure of the actual questions used.

Winter shmoozing

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

It's winter. The days can be cold. We therefore spend many Canadian months nesting, like bears, and discovering ourselves in a much more intimate and concentrated way than in other seasons.

Me, I like nothing more in the winter than sharing a pot of chai tea with vibrant people and storytellers, and schmoozing about life. The other night I did just that with Eran, 27, an Israeli living in Toronto.

Eran is one of those guys who grips you, and does so with his eyes. They are dark, mystifying and puzzled, eyes you figure have seen a lot, too much. He has the uncanny ability to look into other people's eyes and accurately determine what lies within their soul. He was initially hesitant about reading my eyes, explaining that "a person must be careful with such a gift."

Eran was born in Kiryat Shmonah, Israel's northernmost city and a regular target for Katyusha rockets fired from Lebanon. Nechemia Meyers, a freelancer from the region writing about Kiryat Shmonah, said, "Three of my grandchildren spent much of their early childhood sleeping in an air raid shelter... while under heavy rocket attacks from Lebanon." (jewishreview.org)

Eran's father recently retired as a Kiryat Shmonah fireman, a job that required him to exit the bomb shelter and race to the scene of an explosion. No greater gift exists than to be a child, and the son of a fireman, especially an Israeli fireman. It is empowering to be the son of a valiant man.

The evening wore on and Eran's stories unravelled in full colour. The story I most enjoyed was one he told me matter of factly.

One night, a couple of years ago while still living in Kiryat Shmona, Eran returned home, unlocked the door, entered his apartment and discovered a man inside, running from room to room. Within moments, any movement stopped, both men stood their ground and stared for a pregnant moment in frightened/curious disbelief about the other's presence.

Eran spoke first. "Who are you and what are you doing in my apartment?" he asked. The man replied, "I'm stealing from you." Eran hesitated, giving respect to the irregularity of the retort, and asked him why he would do such a thing? The thief replied that he was sorry, but was poor and hungry with a drug habit.

Eran's response was brilliant, a true act of humanity. He asked the poor fellow if he wouldn't rather sit down and join him for a cup of coffee and sandwiches – and perhaps determine together a wiser solution to his problem.

The embarrassed thief and the fireman's son indeed pulled up a seat and schmoozed for the next couple of hours about Israeli politics, the economy and a plan for the young Jewish fellow to build a more honest and productive life. Eran said he only saw the amiable intruder once after that, during which no mention was made of the bumbled but constructive break-in.

In the freezing winter months, walking can be laborious and driving perilous. The season can make one feel as though he or she is in the middle of a gridlock on the Burlington Bridge – with nowhere to go, and little to do but take in the moment.

It therefore makes sense to stay home, sip a hot cup of tea and just shmooze. Inevitably, we can end up uncovering grand slices of life – like that of an Israeli fireman's son conversing with an inept thief... stories that might evade us on the warm, adventuresome days of summer.

Bush calls Iran a 'grave threat'

By NATHAN GUTTMAN
Jerusalem Post

WASHINGTON — U.S. President George W. Bush warned last week that if Iran goes forward with its nuclear program, it might pose a "grave threat to the security of the world."

Bush, speaking after a meeting with German Chancellor Angela Merkel at the White House, voiced his concern over Iran's decision to pursue uranium enrichment, and he used the same language he used before launching the U.S. attack against Iraq.

Bush stressed that Israel was in the most danger from Iran's nuclear developments. When referring to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's call to "wipe Israel off the map," Bush said that "the development of a nuclear weapon, it seems to me, would make them a step closer to achieving that objective."

Merkel, in her first visit to the United States since being elected to lead Germany, agreed with the tough line presented by the United States concerning Iran, and joined the call to refer the Iranian nuclear issue to the UN Security Council.

The United States has already gained the support of the European Union for the referral, and Russia has tended to support this move as well. U.S. diplomacy is focused now on China, who is a permanent member of the Security Council and holds the right to veto any decision brought to the forum. Iran supplies China with more than 300,000 barrels of oil a day, making it a valuable contributor to the Chinese economy.

Doctors wean Sharon from respirator

By JUDY SIEGEL-ITZKOVICH
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon underwent the successful surgical insertion of a tracheotomy tube Sunday night to help doctors wean him from his respirator.

He has been on the respirator since suffering a massive stroke Jan. 4.

A tracheotomy involves making a small hole in the windpipe and attaching a ventilator to it, rather than to a mask over his face.

Doctors said last week that Sharon might need the procedure because the tube connecting Sharon's windpipe with the respirator would start to cause him damage if it remained in for too long. The minor surgery, which the Hadassah University Medical Center spokesperson said was "part of his treatment plan," was preceded by a computerized tomography (CT) scan.

Sharon remained in critical but stable condition Sunday evening ahead of the surgery, the hospital said in a statement.

Asked whether doctors still hope Sharon will emerge from his coma, the spokesperson said: "Yes."

Doctors said Saturday that Sharon, who has been unconscious since the stroke, had activity on both sides of his brain.

Last week, doctors began weaning him from the sedatives that had kept him in an induced coma to give his brain time to heal from the stroke and three subsequent surgeries. By Saturday, he was only receiving light sedation, but remained unconscious.

40% of Ashkenazim share 'founding mothers'

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post

HAIFA — Although they probably weren't named Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah, four Jewish "founding mothers" who lived in Europe 1,000 years ago have been credited with being the ancestors of nearly half of all Ashkenazi Jews, who constitute the majority of the current Jewish population.

About 3.5 million people – or 40 per cent of Ashkenazi Jews currently alive are descended from these matriarchs, who were among a small group that probably migrated from the Middle East, according to the Israeli researchers. The researchers also provide evidence of shared maternal ancestry between Ashkenazi and non-Ashkenazi (Sephardi and Oriental) Jews.

The studies that led to these findings were performed by Doron Behar as part of his doctoral thesis, under the supervision of Karl Skorecki of the Rappaport Faculty of Medicine and Research Institute at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology and at the Rambam Medical Center in Haifa. Skorecki is best known for his 1997 discovery of genetic evidence indicating that the majority of modern-day Jewish men of the priestly tribe (kohanim) are descendants of a single common male ancestor, consistent with the biblical high priest, Aaron.

The News in Brief

Canada

New Gem Deadline

TORONTO — A Tel Aviv judge last week once again ordered Boaz Manor, co-founder of failed Toronto hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management, to turn in allegedly ill-gotten diamonds within a week or face seven days in jail. KPMG, Portus' receiver, says he bought them with Portus funds after the firm failed. Manor, who fled to Israel after Portus' collapse last year, faces Ontario Securities Commission charges related to the firm, which the RCMP is also probing. KPMG is trying to find $800 million in missing funds and has gone to court in Canada and Israel to force Manor to help. The judge threatened to jail Manor before, but he denied having the gems, the Globe and Mail reported.

Eight Stabbed at Shul

MOSCOW — A man stabbed eight men at Moscow's downtown Bolshaya Bronnaya Synagogue just before Jan. 11 evening services, when it was full of worshippers. The man, Alexander Koptsev, 20, struck out at random before being pushed to the ground by Yitzhak Kogan, the shul's rabbi, who was stabbed, and his son. One man was in critical condition and four others were in serious condition, officials said. Russians, Israelis, and an American were among the wounded. Witnesses said the man, who looked like a skinhead, shouted, "I came to kill you" as he attacked. The shul is one of Moscow's oldest and the base of Agudas Chasidei Chabad in Russia. Authorities said Koptsev is not a member of any nationalist groups, but he was charged with racially motivated attempted murder.

Zundel Trial Back On

BERLIN — The trial of a Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel will resume Feb. 9 in Germany. A white supremacist who was a leading distributor of neo-Nazi literature in Canada, Zundel faces charges of inciting hate and denying the Holocaust, both crimes in Germany. Canada deported him to his native Germany in March 2005 after he was declared a security threat. His trial was delayed in November after the judge fired one of his lawyers. Zundel says both Canada and Germany are denying him the right to free speech.

Cleric Slurs Jews

LONDON — A Muslim cleric on trial in Britain for inciting hate said Hitler was sent into the world because Jews are blasphemous and dirty. Abu Hamza al-Masri made the comments last Wednesday in a London court. He faces eight charges of soliciting murder against "non-believers," including four against Jews. He's also charged with possessing video and audio recordings he intended to distribute to foment hate. The trial is expected to last at least three weeks. He has pleaded innocent to all charges.

Boycott Apology

OSLO — Norway's finance minister apologized for calling for a boycott of Israeli exports. Israel's embassy in Oslo said it has received an apology for the widely criticized remarks by Kristin Halvorsen, whose Socialist Left party is part of a coalition government. She made the remarks before Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Jan. 4 stroke.

Boys Attacked

PARIS — Two Jewish boys wearing kippot were attacked in front of a train station in a Paris suburb. The National Bureau of Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism said the 11-year-olds were approached by four or five men of African and Arab origin who hurled racial epithets at them before striking one to the ground and holding the other forcefully. A 22-year-old Jewish man tried to intervene and was hit on the head and chest, and grabbed by the throat. The men fled by bus.

Conference Planned

TEHRAN — An Iranian journalists' association is reportedly planning a conference on the Shoah that will be open to those who question it. The conference, being organized by the Association of Islamic Journalists, comes after Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, recently denied the Holocaust in remarks he later said were aimed at galvanizing Muslim youth. "We will invite those who believe in the imposed version as well as all those who have spent years of their lives in the study of documents related to the Holocaust and have come to the conclusion that the history books in schools and universities do not correspond to the truth," a group spokesperson said.

Anti-Semitic Graffiti Found In Jewish Areas

MONTREAL — The Snowdon area of Montreal has been the target of a rash of anti-Semitic graffiti, some of it apparently intended to spread the views of a neo-Nazi group in Russia, since soon after the new year.

The graffiti include large swastikas and the letters "HCO," which is the Cyrillic acronym for NSO (New Free Society), an ultra-nationalist Russian group. In some cases, the Internet address of NSO was also included. The Russian-language site includes a photo of Adolf Hitler, along with excerpts from his book Mein Kampf.

The graffiti were found in seven separate locations by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, which has asked police and city officials to investigate.

The seven graffiti were located within a radius of few blocks of Montreal's Jewish Community Campus, and close to synagogues and Jewish schools, B'nai Brith said.

Millennial generation changing the face of Hillel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A Hillel-sponsored study that surveyed more than 600 American Jewish students revealed that Jewish youths, referred to as "millennials," are more likely than their parents' generation to be part of an interfaith family, to have a non-Jewish boyfriend or girlfriend and to identify as ethnically Jewish rather than religiously Jewish.

If Hillel is going to succeed in its mission of enriching the lives of more Jewish students on campuses across the continent, the first step is to better understand them and relate to them on their level, said Zac Kaye, the executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Kaye said the study's findings, which he believes are consistent with the situation in Toronto, have forced organizations like Hillel to change their approach when reaching out to Jewish youth.

"The study says that there are many people in this community that don't see themselves as a part of what we call a traditional community, nor are they accessing Judaism through the normative channels," he said.

"If they are 'doing Jewish,' they are doing it in their own way and they are not making a big fuss about it. They are not looking to institutionalize their Judaism."

In an attempt to address this problem, Hillel has changed its mission statement from "maximizing the number of Jews doing Jewish with other Jews," to "enriching the lives of Jewish undergraduate and graduate students so that they may enrich the Jewish people and the world."

Hillel has also laid out a five-year plan to double the number of students who have meaningful Jewish experiences.

But before the Jewish campus group can achieve this goal, it is important for it to understand that what millennials find meaningful may differ from what their parents consider a meaningful Jewish experience.

"[The millennials] are looking for meaning, for a sense of what is right, but in their own way, on their own terms. Their spiritual search is outside of the synagogues, the institutions. For them, how we express ourselves inside our institutions, doesn't resonate," he added.

Susannah Dainow, 25, and a University of Toronto graduate, is one of the young Jews that the study talks about.

Although Dainow herself was involved with Hillel as a student in the arts and culture program, she still considers herself as part of the unaffiliated Jewish group.

She said that as a young Jew, she feels her choices are limited when it comes to participating in Jewish events and would often rather take part in non-Jewish events.

"If the choice is between paying to go to a Shabbat dinner whose Jewish content I don't find meaningful, alongside people who are unfriendly and snobby, or doing something non-Jewish that I enjoy in the company of people who treat me well, the latter is going to win out every time.

"It often seems I'm left with a choice of participating through gritted teeth, or trying to find ways of doing it myself, neither of which is ideal in terms of Jewish observance or identity," she said.

Although the study suggests that some Jewish students will take it upon themselves to organize events that speak to them, Jewish institutions should be more willing to embrace the idea that there is no right or wrong way to express Judaism, and to encourage informal gatherings, Kaye said.

"If they are going to do Jewish, they will do it the way that speaks to them. People want to express themselves in a way that they are comfortable with. And that doesn't necessarily mean that they have to turn up at the synagogue or Hillel to do it," he said.

"They are not looking to follow their parents in terms of the familial affiliation with synagogue and Jewish institutions."

The difference in the attitudes of millennials and their parents' can perhaps be attributed to the freedom that Jews enjoy today, Kaye said.

"The openness of society, the challenge of technology, all of these things, the acceptance of Jews in North America, the comfort level

From the editor's desk

Last year, the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPI), based in Jerusalem, issued its first annual assessment of the condition of worldwide Jewry. It was called Between Thriving and Declining.

The title was a clear statement by the sage compilers of the report that they believe the Jewish People stand at a crossroads in shaping and determining our future. One road leads to thriving; the other to decline. "Present trends," the report states, "have the potential for better and for worse."

The report is an impressive, comprehensive cross-tabulation of the inter-related internal and external factors affecting the future of the Jewish people. To achieve a thriving future, the report maps out a broad strategic agenda that contains 18 specific policy directions. The report identifies one of those 18 policy directions as counteracting demographic decline.

Two weeks ago in The CJN, Leo Davids, professor emeritus of sociology at York University in Toronto, gave a vivid description of that demographic decline.

"What is the big picture concerning Jewish population in the Diaspora? To be brief about it, the numbers are not very encouraging... The population is either static or shrinking."

Davids went on to explain the reasons for the decline, most of which, as he also pointed out, CJN readers already know.

The JPPI authors stated that the "demographic trends seem to indicate an unsavoury future, both for major Jewish communities around the world and for Israel. This is true both in absolute numbers and in relative numbers in comparison to potentially hostile groups..."

To counteract the demographic decline – which, it must be remembered, is merely one of 18 broad directions prescribed to achieve a thriving Jewish future – the compilers of the report point to eight "cardinal" policy initiatives.

The third item on the list of eight is "Facilitating in-marriages and promotion of pro-family measures."

Another way of expressing this item is helping Jewish singles who wish it to find each other.

This is a subject whose importance cannot be overstated. It expresses the existential Jewish question that, at one time or another, passes through the minds of most Jewish parents: will our grandchildren be Jewish?

In the GTA alone, are some 56,000 Jewish singles, a large number of whom, if not most, it is safe to say, would prefer not to be single.

Judith Weinroth and Jerry Maser

Two Toronto individuals, Jerry Maser and Judith Weinroth, have proposed an ambitious initiative to try to halt and even reverse the decline in Jewish demographics. It is called the Jewish Singles World.

Last month, on Dec. 8, 2005, they spoke to The CJN about their project.

The broad outlines of the proposal are to "develop an environment where Jewish singles can meet... No other way can be as attractive, comfortable or fulfilling as regularly meeting and participating with other singles within your own age group."

The distinguishing feature of Jewish Singles World is that it will deliver its message "to the total community of presently unreachable Jews by a mass media advertising campaign, which will be centred upon a unique secure website.

"This is not a dating service," Maser and Weinroth emphasize in their materials. Rather, "it is a community development outreach program. It is entirely based on the interaction of Jewish singles, for the first time being able to tell us what they want to be part of the Jewish community."

The initiative has been endorsed by a broad swath of religious and community-based authorities. But it requires seed money to become launched. They estimate they need $300,000.

And that is the stumbling block. Maser and Weinroth have been unable to find those funds.

There is no doubt that our organized community leadership recognizes the importance of trying to bring Jewish singles together. In the GTA, for example, UJA Federation already underwrites programs such as the Singles Directory and Singles Hotline. Indeed, Jewish singles programs exist in every large community.

But clearly, these programs are not enough. More must be done. Our community leaders must become more actively engaged in finding fresh, imaginative programming for our Jewish singles. The driving force of Jewish singles programming must not be left to the private sector alone. The issue of Jewish demographic decline is too far-reaching in its implications for community leaders to yield the much-needed transformative programming to the for-profit sector alone.

Perhaps they should meet with Maser and Weinroth to hear their ideas. In helping them, they help us all. They would also steer us more hopefully toward the thriving future that the JPPI authors say is ours to create.

Rabbi looks for ways to build bridges with Muslims

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl says he is convinced that the Jewish community must do all it can to develop a relationship with the Islamic community.

The senior rabbi of Beth Tzedec Congregation, Canada's largest synagogue, spoke last month at a major Islamic conference in Toronto and has since taken part in a live question-and-answer session on an Islamic website (www.islamonline.net).

Imam Hamid Slimi of the Toronto-based International Muslims Organization invited Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, whom he had met at a Canadian Jewish Congress-sponsored interfaith dialogue, to speak at the fourth annual Reviving the Islamic Spirit convention.

More than 12,000 North American Muslims attended the event, held at the National Trade Centre Dec. 23 to 25. Rev. Bruce Gregerson of the United Church of Canada spoke at the same session as Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, which was a benefit concert for victims of the October earthquake in Pakistan.

The rabbi said that, prior to the invitation, he and Imam Slimi had already discussed commonalities between the two religions, including "ways that we acknowledge God when we eat."

Religion often identified as source of division and conflict

At the conference, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said that religion is often identified as a source of division and conflict.

"Yet our essential message is not one of despair, but of hope. There is much that we can learn from each other."

He cautioned young Muslims to distinguish between aspects of secular culture that are "illusionary and problematic," and those that are "worthwhile and good," such as "technological progress, tolerance for difference and the value of democracy as a way to create a civil society."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl admits to having had some initial hesitation about participating in the conference as the sole rabbi and only kippah-wearer among more than 12,000 Muslim attendees. At first, he knew nothing about the purpose of the conference or even who was organizing it. "But Imam Slimi assured me it was a friendly invitation," he said.

In an interview following his talk, the rabbi told a representative of the Iranian Quran News Agency that Jews and Muslims should see themselves as children of Abraham. "We should look for ways to overcome our differences while remaining true to who we are."

His said his thoughts on Jewish-Muslim dialogue were influenced by Aviezer Ravitzky, an Israeli professor who spoke at Beth Tzedec a few years ago. "In a seminar, he spoke about how religion can be a bridge between these two groups, and not just a point of division and conflict. He made the point that religion can be used as a way of building some of these bridges, and I've looked for ways to do that."

Since the conference, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl's involvement in Jewish-Muslim dialogue seems to have snowballed. "It's interesting how one thing moves into another," he said.

Recently a Turkish Muslim group invited members of his congregation to participate with other faith groups, including Buddhists and Evangelical Christians, in an interfaith dinner at Toronto's Noor Cultural Centre (a Muslim centre located at the former Japanese Cultural Centre).

Feedback from the rabbi's congregants on his recent outreach efforts have tended to be positive, he said. "Congregants have generally been pleased, I think surprised and intrigued [albeit] a little nervous."

Likewise, at the conference, "there was a positive response. People thanked me for coming, and said they appreciated what I had to say."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, right, shared a podium with Imam Hamid Slimi, centre, and Rev. Bruce Gregerson at the Reviving the Islamic Spirit convention in Toronto last month.

Jewish museum in Poland set to open in 2008

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the first project of its kind in Poland, a museum of Polish Jewry will be built in Warsaw, on the site of the Nazi wartime ghetto.

The Museum of the History of Polish Jews, which will be a cultural centre as well, will be opened in the second half of 2008, said Ewa Junczyk-Ziomecka, the deputy director.

In Toronto recently to publicize what she described as the biggest museum project in Europe today, she said it will celebrate the millennium-long Jewish presence in Poland.

Scheduled to be constructed on 13,000 square metres of land adjacent to Warsaw's Holocaust monument, it will offer a multimedia narrative of 1,000 years of Jewish history in Poland.

The museum will be housed in nine galleries, and the newest exhibition technologies will be used to engage visitors. It is expected to draw up to 500,000 visitors annually.

"This is not a Holocaust museum, but a museum of life," said Junczyk-Ziomecka, a 55-year-old former journalist, in an interview.

"It will be a significant statement about the importance of Jews in Poland yesterday and today," noted Peter Jassem, the president of the Polish Jewish Heritage Foundation, which sponsored her presentation at the University of Toronto's Wolfond Centre.

The museum may well alter popular perceptions of Poland. "For many Jews, Poland is a giant cemetery," Junczyk-Ziomecka admitted, referring to the virtual decimation of Polish Jewry during the Nazi occupation.

She understands why most Jews regard Poland as little more than a vast graveyard. "The Germans picked Poland to build most of their concentration camps."

From her perspective, however, Poland's enduring image as a Jewish killing ground is unfair and in need of revision because Poland was a safe haven for Jews for centuries.

"We owe so much to Jews, who participated in the culture, economy and science of Poland. There is no history of Poland without Jews."

Ewa Junczyk-Ziomecka

Jews in prewar Poland comprised 10 per cent of its overall population. The comparable figures in France, Holland and the former Soviet Union were 0.8 per cent, 1.7 per cent and 1.6 per cent, respectively. Apart from Jews, Ukrainians and Germans also formed important minorities in Poland.

Yet until the collapse of the Communist regime in 1990, the rich symbiotic relationship between Jews and Poles was all but unknown and the multicultural nature of Polish society was buried under layers of Polish nationalism.

"There is a lack of knowledge," said Junczyk-Ziomecka, a former Solidarity movement activist who temporarily settled in the United States upon leaving Poland in 1982 after being forbidden to practise journalism. "It would not have been possible to build a museum like this during the Communist period."

Taking the story of Polish Jewry up to the year 2000, the museum will, among other things, electronically reproduce the interior of a synagogue in Pinczow, part of a "Jewish" street in interwar Warsaw and a fragment of a shtetl in the countryside.

A separate gallery will deal with the Holocaust. Nor will the museum shy away from unpleasant aspects of the encounter between Poles and Jews, said Junczyk-Ziomecka.

"It will tell the truth, and anti-Semitism is part of the truth," she acknowledged. "We are not afraid of the truth. We will also cover the dark side."

Hewing to this balanced approach, exhibits will document the 1946 Kielce pogrom, the 1968 state-sponsored anti-Semitic campaign and the emigration of Jews in the aftermath of these events.

On a positive level, the museum will chart the post-Communist revival of Poland's Jewish community, whose current size is estimated to run from 10,000 to 30,000.

Asked whether she agrees with the thesis that Jews and Poles have had a contentious relationship, she replied, "There was not that much love or hate. There was coexistence for 900 years, until the 1930s, when a big wave of anti-Semitism covered Europe."

In her view, anti-Semitism is a problem that transcends Poland's borders. "We hope our museum will explode stereotypes about Jews."

The brainchild of the Jewish Historical Institute Association in Warsaw, the museum was designed by the Finnish firm of Lahdelma & Mahlamaki Architects.

The winning design was drawn from 11 shortlisted entries, including one submitted by Daniel Libeskind, the designer of Berlin's newly inaugurated Holocaust memorial.

The cost of building the museum is expected to be around the $52 to $55 million (US) mark.

The Polish government and the municipality of Warsaw have donated half of the required funds, $26 million. Poland's former president, Aleksander Kwasniewski, was very supportive, she said.

Jewish philanthropists from Poland, Belgium, France and the United States have pledged $7 million. Germany has promised to send additional funds.

"We need at least $17 million to complete the project," she said. "We'd like the Canadian Jewish community to participate."

Asked whether the museum may fall short of its fundraising target, she said, "I can't imagine that." But she conceded that many potential donors have rejected her overtures for assistance.

In the meantime, the museum is looking for Jewish artifacts to register and post on its database. So far, 60,000 artifacts have been registered and posted.

Junczyk-Ziomecka joined the museum as director of development in 2000. Before returning to Poland 13 years ago, she worked for Polish-language newspapers in the United States.

She learned a lot about Polish Jews while living in Detroit and New York. During her sojourn in America, she was a member of Dialog, a group that fosters good relations between Poles, Jews and Ukrainians.

Paul Martin's Liberals

Working to Building Strong Communities
Supporting Canadian Families

We have delivered eight balanced budgets and built an economy that is the envy of the world. And today, Canada has the resources to invest in the things we all count on: health care, early learning and child care, safe cities and thriving families.

- Making our City Streets Safe, Again

We'll protect our streets from the growing threat of violent crime by banning all handguns, doubling minimum sentences for key gun crimes and tightening bail requirements for criminals with guns. And we're working closely with cities to establish effective crime prevention programs. We'll invest $50 million in a fund to prevent gun violence, curb gangs and get tough on stemming the flow of illegal weapons into Canada.

- Cutting Higher Education Tuition in Half

Education is the most important guarantee we have to building our economy and securing Canada's ability to compete globally. Paul Martin's Liberals will pay half the tuition for students in their first and last year of college or university – a $8,000 savings to your family for every student's higher education.

- Providing Timely Health Care

We are delivering on our promises by cutting the time you wait for the most critical medical procedures. We're funding universities to train an additional 1,000 new family doctors and we will launch a $300 million National Cancer Strategy. And should you have to wait too long at home for critical care, we'll pay your travel and accommodation costs for treatment elsewhere in Canada. That's our Canada Health Care Guarantee.

- Providing Affordable Day Care

We have agreement with the provinces and are funding a $6 billion National Child Care Program. That's enough to fund 125,000 affordable new daycare spaces – which parents and children desperately need.

- Guaranteeing Compassionate Leave for Everyone

We will help working Canadians to care for their sick loved ones by guaranteeing their right to a leave of absence from work of up to two months. While away, the government will provide financial benefits. We will also increase the caregiver tax credit to $15,500 and provide $500 million in new support for families with disabled persons.

The Choice is Clear.

On January 23, vote for a Government that truly supports your family,

Anti-freedom forces must not win

The Canadian flag flew at half mast on Sunday at the Peace Tower on Parliament Hill in Ottawa. It is a time-honoured, understated, yet powerfully depictive manner of announcing national mourning. The country had suffered loss. And we had all to notice and pay tribute.

Foreign Affairs officer, Glyn Berry, 59, was killed and three Canadian soldiers were wounded on Sunday when the armoured convoy in which they were riding near Kandahar in Afghanistan was rammed by a car driven by a suicide bomber.

The attacker followed typical suicide bombing protocol: he targeted a crowd of civilians at a bus stop. As the convoy approached, he struck.

Glyn was part of a 250-person reconstruction team that was engaged in humanitarian work around Kandahar. He had dedicated himself, simply, to trying to help ordinary Afghanis restore their lives and rebuild their country. He believed in the importance of his work. He believed in the mission in which Canadians and others are participating in Afghanistan. At least two Afghan civilians were also killed in the attack and 10 other Afghans wounded.

Someone speaking in the name of the Taliban claimed responsibility for the attack, threatening that "these attacks will continue for a long time."

Sunday's incident was the 25th such suicide attack in the past four months in Afghanistan. It suggests a new, worrisome pattern of "fighting" by the anti-coalition forces there. Some experts now fear that the murderous methods and anarchical purposes of the anti-government forces in Iraq will be imported to Afghanistan. However, that should not be surprising since the suicide bombers in Afghanistan and Iraq – and in Gaza and the West Bank for that matter – share the same anti-humanitarian, anti-freedom ideology.

In Iraq, the media has inappropriately called them insurgents. "Insurgents," however, implies that, as individuals opposed to the new civic authority, they would direct their campaign against the new government. But the planners and perpetrators of the suicide attacks in Iraq aim most of their murder at other Iraqis, such as the hundreds of non-military, unarmed civilians, who were attending a funeral last week.

There are some 650 Canadian troops in Afghanistan. Plans are underway to increase the force by more than 1,000 additional soldiers next month. The government announced that the attack on Sunday will not affect its plan to augment the Canadian military presence in Afghanistan.

Nine Canadians have been killed in Afghanistan since 2002. We hope and pray none more, whether Canadians or others helping to build democracy, will lose their lives there. The determination of the government not to yield to the forces opposed to freedom and democracy is commendable.

From an undecided voter

When the federal election was called, I was faced with mixed feelings when deciding whom to vote for. Often, I would go back and forth between the candidates. Sometimes, I would base my decision on the candidates within my riding; at other times, I dismissed the actual candidate and took the party that they represented into consideration. I thought that I had finally come to a decision when it occurred to me that I was not sure I liked what this decision was based on. With the onslaught of the attack campaigns in the media, it occurred to me what was bothering me – I was just choosing the least of three evils.

It concerns me that the purpose of campaigning in this election has become solely to try to make the other party look bad. What seems to have been lost in this bickering and schoolyard bullying is what each party will give to Canada. And so I ask the candidates, what will change over the next few years if you are elected? Why should I vote for you? But here's the catch: you have to let the electorate know this, without bashing the other parties. I want to be able to say I voted for a candidate because his or her platform coincided with my view of how Canada should be, and not because I think the candidate will do the least amount of damage while in office.

Raoul Wallenberg Day

Raoul Wallenberg has a special place in the history of the struggle for human rights. During World War II, he left Sweden and went to one of the bloodiest places of the war, to Budapest, Hungary, to save people of different religion, ethnicity and traditions. And he prevailed: as a diplomat in Budapest, he saved 100,000 Jewish lives.

Wallenberg became a symbol of justice and humanity. Raoul Wallenberg Commemorative Day is held annually on Jan. 17. On that day in 1945, he was arrested by agents of the former Soviet Union and disappeared.

In 1956, the Russians stated in the so-called Gromyko memorandum that Wallenberg died in Moscow prison in 1947, of a heart attack. In 2000, they said he had been shot. In a report, the Swedish section of the Swedish-Russian Working Group stated that "the Russian announcement of Raoul Wallenberg's death could only be accepted if it were confirmed beyond any reasonable doubt."

The search for the truth about Wallenberg's fate continues.

Survivors publishing program

I would like to offer a clarification regarding the submission-to-publication process of the Memoirs of Canadian Holocaust Survivors Publishing Program ("Azrieli launches project to publish survivors' memoirs," CJN, Mtl.-Dec. 15, Tor.-Dec. 22).

We are still soliciting, receiving and cataloguing submissions. Early this year, we will begin sorting and reading the submissions we have received and, if necessary, sending them for translation, typing, etc. On the signing of a release form, issued to authors (or their heirs), we will begin the process of light editing and rigorous fact-checking. The critical step of fact-checking will be undertaken by postgraduate academic specialists in the field and is intended, for example, to ensure that historical references are accurately identified.

Following the first round of edits, the manuscripts will be sent for review by the senior editorial team, which includes Concordia University professors Mervin Butovsky, Kurt Jonassohn and Norman Ravvin. Once the final edits have been made, the manuscripts will be sent to the authors (or their heirs) for sign-off with a final release form. Authors or their heirs will be kept abreast of each stage as regularly as possible.

A public launch will be scheduled for each series of volumes published, to which authors and/or their heirs will be invited.

We should pray for Sharon's health

I have read your various articles regarding Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's health issues. Lately, I have been hearing controversial discussion on whether or not to say tehillim for Sharon. I feel that this matter shouldn't even be thought over. The Torah stresses the idea to not stand by when your fellow Jew is in trouble. Regardless of what people may think of Sharon's actions in Gaza, it is our duty, the duty of the Jewish people, to pray for his health. It is our obligation to embrace the mitzvah of "al ta'amod al dam reicha." It is our care for one another that has kept us a strong nation for thousands of years.

How Sharon's successor could succeed

By YOSSI KLEIN HALEVI

When Ehud Olmert was a teenage leader of the right-wing Betar youth movement in the 1950s, he would mark May Day by tearing down the red flag that hung over the trade union building in his northern village of Binyamina. For Olmert and his friends, that flag symbolized what they referred to as "the Vichy government" of Labor Zionism, which had betrayed the land of Israel by twice accepting its partition – first in 1923, when the British created Transjordan, and then in 1947, when the United Nations divided what was left of historic Palestine into Jewish and Arab states. Betar's fantasy map of a once-and-future Israel – incorporating the West Bank and the Kingdom of Jordan – hung on the walls of the clubhouse where Olmert served as "commander," and it was imprinted on the patch of his military-style uniform. At meetings, he would lead his scouts in singing, "Both banks of the Jordan [River], this one is ours and that one too."

While Olmert eventually accepted the loss of Transjordan, he devoted his political career to maintaining Israeli control over the territory won in the 1967 Six Day War. As a Likud Knesset member, he voted against then prime minister Menachem Begin's decision to cede Sinai to Egypt in exchange for peace. And, as mayor of Jerusalem beginning in 1993, he defended Israel's right to govern the united city. His campaign posters invoked the nightmare image of PLO flags hanging from the Old City walls. Asked by a journalist in the 1980s to describe the most important public post he had held, he answered without hesitation, "Commander of the Binyamina branch of Betar."

Yet Olmert, acting prime minister and heir to Ariel Sharon as head of the new centrist Kadima Party, could now become the Israeli leader who presides over the partition of greater Israel – and even of united Jerusalem, an act he would have once considered treason. In the absence of a credible Palestinian partner for peace, Olmert supports unilateral withdrawal from the West Bank. Indeed, he publicly endorsed unilateralism even before Sharon did.

The question Israelis are asking, though, is whether Olmert can handle it. After all, uprooting tens of thousands of ideologically committed settlers from the biblical heartland is likely to be far more politically traumatic than the withdrawal from Gaza. The conventional wisdom here is that, without Sharon, no further unilateral withdrawals are possible. Only Sharon and his military credentials, goes the argument, could have convinced the public to withdraw from most of the West Bank, despite the threat of Palestinian missiles falling on greater Tel Aviv. Olmert, by contrast, enjoys no such credibility: His career in uniform was mostly spent as a reporter for the army newspaper. But Olmert's ideological background affords him advantages that could well make the new leader of Kadima a more effective proponent of withdrawal than skeptics will admit.

For one thing, Olmert – with roots in Revisionist Zionism, the movement that spawned Betar and eventually the Likud – has right-wing bona fides that Sharon lacked. Sharon grew up in the Labor movement and related to the territories in pragmatic security terms. For Olmert, though, settling the territories was an historical imperative. "The ideological transformation that Ehud and I and others have made is far more painful than Sharon's," asserts Moshe Amirav, an Olmert friend from his Betar days who was expelled from the Likud for meeting with PLO leaders in the late 1980s. "For us, separating from greater Israel meant losing our dream."

Those ideological credentials give Olmert the self-confidence to confront the settlers and their supporters without the unease that Sharon at times revealed, as when he initially avoided meeting with Gaza settlers to explain his about-face and then failed to defend himself vigorously against settler attacks. Olmert, by contrast, relishes a fight with opponents of withdrawal. Last August, on the first day of the Gaza pullout, Olmert represented the government at a ceremony at Ben-Gurion Airport to welcome 250 new American immigrants, most of them Orthodox and opponents of withdrawal. They were joined by several hundred Israeli family and friends, who were warned by organizers to keep politics out of the event. Yet it was Olmert who turned the event political. Goading his audience, he announced that the Gaza withdrawal was the beginning of a new era for Israel. When the crowd inevitably responded with boos and shouts of "traitor," Olmert smiled and taunted them back. Referring to Israel's demographic crisis, he said, "Maybe if you or a few million of you had come earlier, we wouldn't have had to leave Gaza."

Ehud Olmert

That feistiness is a trait he acquired in Betar. To be a Betar member in 1950s Israel meant being the ultimate iconoclast. In a pioneering society that equated socialism with Zionism, capitalist Betar championed an alternative Zionist history whose heroes were Revisionists and villains were Laborites. Denouncing Israeli relations with Germany as a betrayal of the Jews who died in the Holocaust, Olmert and his friends picketed movie theatres that screened German films and refused to ride in Mercedes taxis. Even their uniforms marked them as anachronisms: Betar leaders wore light-blue ties on their dark blue uniforms – this, in a country whose prime minister went tieless. "We were considered strange, even lunatics, but we were proud of being outcasts," recalls Amirav.

Olmert has always been an in-your-face politician. He began his career in national politics by demanding that Begin resign as head of Herut, the precursor of the Likud, because of his electoral failures – an unprecedented attack on Begin's stature within the party. As the Knesset's youngest member at age 28, he joined with another junior member of parliament, left-wing provocateur Yossi Sarid, to challenge organized crime in soccer. (Olmert himself would later be investigated, and acquitted, on charges of campaign financing irregularities.) Olmert never managed to build a wide political base, notes one Likud activist, because of his patronizing attitude: "Bibi [Benjamin Netanyahu] will agree with whatever you say and then go ahead and do the opposite, but Olmert wants you to know you're wrong."

Amirav, who teaches public policy, also sees Olmert's tenure as mayor of Jerusalem as a turning point: "He realized that maintaining control over 200,000 Palestinians endangers Israeli rule in the city. I once asked him if he had a solution for Jerusalem. He said he did, but he wouldn't tell me, because he's afraid to tell himself." Olmert, who, as mayor, supported Jewish settlements in the Jerusalem Arab neighbourhood of Silwan, has gone on record as supporting Israeli withdrawal from Jerusalem's outer Arab neighbourhoods, but not from the Old City. Still, he will allow east Jerusalem Palestinians to vote in the upcoming Palestinian elections, a move opposed by the right as opening the way for repartitioning the city.

Some old comrades are enraged at Olmert for what they perceive as an even greater betrayal of the Revisionist legacy than his support for partition. In a speech last summer to a dovish American group, the Israel Policy Forum, Olmert claimed that Israelis long for peace because "we are tired of fighting, we are tired of being courageous, we are tired of winning, we are tired of defeating our enemies." Notes Yisrael Medad of Jerusalem's Menachem Begin Heritage Center: "It's one thing to endorse partition because of demographic reasons. But to play the defeatist in the middle of a war is a repudiation of everything Revisionist Zionism always stood for."

Indeed, that kind of "defeatist" rhetoric will play into the hands of Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, who, with Sharon's departure, has emerged as Kadima's most formidable rival. Labor's Amir Peretz is a lightweight with no security experience – hardly the man to reassure an anxious nation facing missile attacks from Gaza, periodic shelling from Hezbollah, an unstable West Bank, and an Iranian atomic bomb. In a recent poll, only 9 per cent of Sephardim said they would vote for the Moroccan-born Peretz, Israel's first Sephardi candidate for prime minister.

Netanyahu, a former prime minister, will remind Israelis that, under his tenure, terrorism reached its lowest point over the last decade. And he'll also remind them that he warned the Gaza withdrawal would result in Qassam rockets falling on the coastal city of Ashkelon. At the time, he was mocked by the press as an alarmist. Now, though, rockets have hit the outskirts of Ashkelon. And, if those rocket attacks intensify, Netanyahu's warnings against further unilateral withdrawals will gain even more credibility. Olmert's advantage is that he is the designated heir of one of Israel's most beloved prime ministers. By contrast, Netanyahu is widely resented, even among Likud voters, both for undermining Sharon's authority within the party and for his welfare cutbacks as finance minister. And the backing he has received from the settlers' umbrella group, the Yesha Council, has reinforced his inflexible image.

Still, Olmert faces several challenges. The first is to keep Kadima's politicians from bickering over power and policies, and destroying the party in its infancy. So far, Kadima's leaders are acting with a sense of national responsibility that's rare in Israel's daily politics but typical in times of crisis. Though several Kadima figures see themselves as potential party heads, they've all accepted Olmert's leadership. Shimon Peres, the only Kadima politician who initially wavered in backing Olmert, was shamed by the Israeli press into belatedly endorsing him and has been appointed to the party's second slot.

Olmert's second challenge is to clarify what Kadima stands for. Despite his support for unilateral withdrawal, some Kadima figures, like former Shin Bet head Avi Dichter, openly oppose it. Under Sharon, the party's platform was essentially, "Trust me." Olmert won't be able to get away with Sharon's deliberate ambiguity.

Most of all, Olmert must convince the electorate that he's a hawkish dove – that is, not just flexible on territory but hardline on security. In conveying that message, Olmert will be bolstered by several ex-Revisionists who, like him, have made the journey from right to centre. His most important ally will be Kadima's candidate for foreign minister, Justice Minister Tzipi Livni, who grew up in Betar and comes from a family steeped in Revisionist pathos: engraved on the tombstone of her father – a hero of the pre-state Irgun underground – is the old Revisionist map, including both banks of the Jordan River. The more Olmert can remind Israelis of where he comes from, the more they will trust him when he tries to pry Israel from its bank on the Jordan.

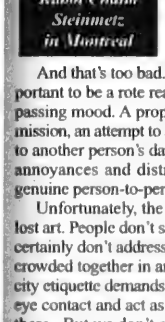
The lost art of hello

It should be easy. The Mishnah says that "one should greet everyone with a pleasant face." At first glance, this seems redundant. Doesn't everyone say hello?

Actually, saying hello is not so simple. We imagine that we greet others properly, but in reality, life can get in the way. When we're rushed or stressed or haven't had our first cup of coffee (my personal weakness), the greeting we give is often meagre and grumpy. Without a good mood, it's hard to give a truly welcoming hello.



Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

And that's too bad. A greeting is too important to be a rote reaction dependent on a passing mood. A proper greeting is a minimission, an attempt to add warmth and cheer to another person's day. You must block out annoyances and distractions, and offer a genuine person-to-person welcome.

Unfortunately, the welcoming hello is a lost art. People don't say hello anymore. We certainly don't address strangers, even when crowded together in an elevator. In fact, big city etiquette demands that we avoid making eye contact and act as if other people aren't there. But we don't only ignore strangers. Even with acquaintances, our greetings are designed to offer a minimum of friendship with a maximum of time efficiency.

Even worse is how we treat proper greetings with contempt. People who offer greetings are often held at a distance, as if they are some sort of threat. I am particularly shocked how people in the service field are often abused. We turn our heads away from Wal-Mart greeters and shout complaints at the secretary before she has a chance to say good morning. Their welcoming hellos are usually ignored.

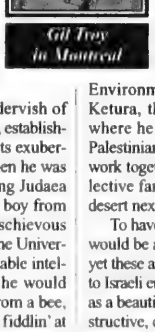
Small towns do things differently. As the sociologist Ferdinand Tonnies noted, big cities develop because they serve the economic and political interests of those who live there. By contrast, in small towns, the community is an end in itself. People are there because they want to live in a community. That's why strangers will receive far more hellos in Thunder Bay than they will in downtown Manhattan. Small towns know what community is all about.

It's time to bring that small-town spirit into our communities, large and small. Isn't it distressing that on Shabbat, in Montreal or Brooklyn or Miami, people don't automatically say "Good Shabbos" to each other in the street? Isn't it wrong for a visitor to enter a synagogue without even one person offering a hello?

I am proud that in my synagogue there is a small cadre of people who perform the lost art of hello. When someone enters, they greet them and make them feel at home. With a few words of conversation, they keep the spirit of community alive. Their mission is simple, yet holy: "Greet everyone with a pleasant face."

Defining the Jewish future on our own terms

On Jan. 10, a ceremony in Jerusalem eloquently repudiated the cartoonish, cops-and-robbers, amoral evenhandedness of Steven Spielberg's Munich, while offering a redeeming response to the anti-Zionist epidemic that Palestinian terrorism unleashed: Israeli environmental activist Alon Tal received the $100,000 Charles Bronfman Prize for humanitarian work by a person under 50 that has "contributed significantly to the betterment of the world."



Gil Troy in Montreal

In a nihilistic sea of negativity, the happy alliance of these two visionaries, Alon Tal and Charles Bronfman, demonstrates that Zionist dreams still can come true, elevating the Jewish people and the rest of humanity – just as Theodor Herzl hoped.

Prof. Alon Tal, 45, is a whirling dervish of social action – jump-starting initiatives, establishing institutes and plunging into projects exuberantly. I first met him 30 years ago, when he was the national programmer for the Young Judaea Zionist youth movement. A good old boy from North Carolina, he combined the mischievous charm of the fraternity king he was at the University of North Carolina with the formidable intellect of the Harvard University PhD he would become. He could sweet talk honey from a bee, dazzle drunken louts with his energetic fiddlin' at Rohman's Inn in Shohola, Penn., and generate enough energy to illuminate a city.

In the late 1980s, during our weekly tennis games at Harvard, Alon, fresh from Israeli army heroics and legal studies at Hebrew University, dreamed of creating an Israeli environmentalist infrastructure as sophisticated as America's. Israel had one environmental lawyer. Alon wanted to be the second, buttressed by a science background from Harvard's School of Public Health. In true Herzlian style, Alon returned to Israel and fulfilled his dream. The organization he founded in 1990, when he was 29, Adam Teva V'din, Israel Union for Environmental Defence, has become Israel's premier environmentalist NGO and has inspired many imitators.

Alon's vision was doubly bold. His Zionist dream focused on quality of life, not simply survival. Moreover, he believed pollution, which respects no boundaries, could scare warring neighbours into co-operating. In 1996, Alon founded the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies (AIES) on Kibbutz Ketura, the Young Judaea-affiliated kibbutz where he lived. The AIES invited Jordanians, Palestinians, Israelis and Americans to study and work together on one of the last functioning collective farms, which was making Israel's stark desert next to Jordan bloom.

To have established either of these institutions would be a lifetime achievement for mortal folk, yet these are but two of Alon's many contributions to Israeli environmentalism that showcase Zionism as a beautiful, liberal, unifying, humanizing, constructive, creative force in the Middle East – and the world.

Bronfman's children established a prize in his name to honour their father's 70th birthday. He is another hero with a roster of superhuman achievements. Had he "only" co-founded birthright israel, which just welcomed its 100,000th visitor to Israel on a free 10-day trip for 18- to 26-year-olds – dayeinu, that would have been enough. Had he "only" been the mensch that he is, inspiring so many of us with his personal warmth and passionate devotion to the common good that, too, would have been enough.

But birthright israel is one of many Bronfman initiatives that are revolutionizing the modern Jewish conversation about Israel, identity-building, education and youth culture by focusing on effective, life-transforming, values-oriented Jewish journeys without guilt or schmaltz. Unlike other philanthropists, Bronfman likes building pride, not buildings. That his children recognize his investments in a flourishing, affirmative, broad-minded Jewish future and are perpetuating it with the prize – and especially with this year's recipient – demonstrates the vision's infectious timelessness and timeliness.

All this makes the timing of Alon's award so delicious. Lost in the debate over Spielberg's softheadedness on terrorism is the filmmaker's broader disservice to the Jewish people. Spielberg and his screenwriter Tony Kushner only see Jewish death, not Jewish life. Munich and Schindler's List together define Judaism and Zionism by violence and victimization, without splendour or serenity. Reducing our magnificent, multi-dimensional, life-affirming civilization to surviving the Holocaust and fighting terrorism lets Nazis and Palestinians, not Jews, define Judaism.

I'll take the humanistic values, Zionist dreams, Jewish romanticism, faith in the future, appreciation for the day-to-day beauty of Israeli life, and the impressive nation-building and world-transforming accomplishments of Alon Tal and Charles Bronfman any day.

The politics of Spielberg's Munich

Unlike Schindler's List, in which Steven Spielberg took great pains to recreate historically accurate sets shot in black and white to mimic documentary footage, his recent film Munich makes a point of announcing itself as "inspired" by history rather than true to fact. That effectively shields it from criticism about the veracity of what it portrays. But its fictional construct invites us to ask – as we would of any fictional account – what the structuring of plot and characters convey.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Despite the violent attack that sets it off, Munich is not really concerned with Palestinian terrorism, nor with probing the motivation, consequences, and moral implications of terror as tactic. As such, the contention that Munich posits moral equivalence between Israel and Palestine is off the mark. Israel is Munich's sole focus, and the film, scripted by Tony Kushner, reveals a deep ambivalence.

The ghastly murder of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Olympic Games provides the pretext for Munich to follow an imagined group of amateurish assassins, secretly charged by the Mossad with avenging the murdered athletes by hunting down and killing the massacre's masterminds. The film depicts former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir's agonized decision to launch the assassination mission as a moral compromise, one she believes necessary to ensure Israel's future by demonstrating the futility of terrorism.

However, although the mission is first framed in terms of deterrence, the line between defence and revenge quickly blurs. Moreover, as the filmmaker and the audience now know, tracking down the Munich terrorists did not bankrupt terrorism as a policy. Indeed, with massive terrorist destruction in major world cities, the reality of suicide bombers as a deliberate tactic provides an ironic comment on Golda's directive. Today, terror not only continues, but has escalated, its tactics increasingly brutal, its scale increasingly massive.

Munich present's Golda's gambit as a moral compromise that costs Israel its soul. Spielberg's assassination team is not based on real people, nor do their intelligence sources and methods conform to the historical record, despite a few enticing details that gesture toward history (such as former prime minister Ehud Barak in drag). Nor are these five imagined assassins fleshed out as real characters. Only the head of the team, Avner, is given a back-story. The other four are merely types – flat, one-dimensional figures intended allegorically.

When we first meet Avner, he is presented as solidly Zionist, unquestioning of his leaders. The film traces the gradual formulation of painful and difficult questions – about the rightness of his mission, the justifiability of violence, and ultimately moral fibre of the country. The other four team members represent different levels of certainly and doubt, stages that Avner passes through or rejects.

When the team first meet, he and Efraim seem well matched. Both feel sure of the purposefulness of their mission. One by one, each of the other men raises moral doubts. Can they be certain they have targeted the right people? Can they justify digressing from their list to kill other purveyors of terror? Can they justify going after the paid female assassin who seduces and murders one of the team? One by one, Spielberg kills off these bearers of moral qualms, implying that Israel has become a country with no place for such men and their humanistic worries. Finally, only Avner and Efraim remain.

Avner, who has argued with his comrades in arms, eventually comes around to their doubts. Only Efraim remains adamant in his belief in violent retribution. Further, of the five assassins, only Efraim is blond and blue-eyed, visually linked with the Aryan ideal, and suggesting that Israel has been so traumatized by the Shoah that it has absorbed something of the perpetrator. Efraim returns to Israel, re-absorbed into its population. By contrast, Avner, tormented by visions of violence, by things he has done and things he fears, takes up permanent residence with his family in Brooklyn, implying that Israel is no place for a man of conscience.

In recent years, a number of Israeli films struggle with the toll of ongoing terror and counterterror on the Israeli psyche. Such films as Walk on Water function as cultural vehicles by which a society examines its most compelling and disturbing issues. But Munich strikes me differently. There is ultimately something facile about an American Jewish director and American Jewish scriptwriter positing an American city as the only place for Jewish moral thinking.

The Kirshner File

France improves relations with Israel

In what is widely regarded as a significant diplomatic development, France has improved its mercurial relationship with Israel. The shift in French foreign policy can be attributed to several factors: the death of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat in November 2004; Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in the summer of 2005; the sharp decline of anti-Semitic incidents in France in the past year; and a convergence of interests between Israel and France over Iran's nuclear program, Syria's interference in Lebanon's affairs and Hezbollah's refusal to disarm.

Sheldon Kirshner in Paris

Alluding to these developments on a fence-mending mission to Paris last July, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said, "Our relations with France are strengthening at every level."

Sharon's upbeat statement was nothing short of remarkable, for he had previously referred to the attacks against French Jews as "the wildest anti-Semitism" and had urged them to immigrate to Israel. Not amused by his comments and unsolicited advice, France declared him persona non grata.

In light of these events, Israeli diplomats in Paris agree that a new, hopeful era is now at hand."Relations have hugely improved," said David Kornbluth, the charge d'affaires and acting ambassador at the Israeli embassy. "We're definitely in a different world. It's not the same France. It's much more friendly. We have a better dialogue." His colleague, Barnea Hassid, the press attache, concurred. "France developed ties with the Arab world at Israel's expense. France realizes it was a mistake, and today, it has a balanced approach."

Jacques Huntzinger, France's ambassador to Israel from 2000 to 2003, pointed out that Sharon's meeting with French President Jacques Chirac was definitely a watershed: "They both realized it was in their respective interests to improve relations." To that end, Chirac and Sharon established a joint commission to promote better bilateral relations. Huntzinger, currently an ambassador-at-large, heads the commission.

Israel's unilateral pullout from Gaza, completed this past September, certainly had a positive impact on French perceptions of Israel."Sharon's policy of disengagement made a difference," Kornbluth said. "The French attitude to Sharon just changed. He had been satanized by the media. But now they see that Israel was not just talking about peace. France was astonished."

Jacques Chirac

Huntzinger, who served in Israel during the darkest days of the second Palestinian uprising, said that Sharon's acceptance of a two-state solution left a favourable impression. "After I met Sharon for the first time, I was convinced he had changed."

The passing of Arafat from the scene was also an important indicator. Arafat, who received emergency medical treatment in France after falling seriously ill in Ramallah, was a bone of contention between the two countries. France considered him a pragmatic, though weak, leader who sought an accommodation with Israel. But to Sharon, Arafat was a schemer who fuelled the embers of the intifadah and sought Israel's destruction through demographic means. Commenting on this divergence of views, Huntzinger said that the Palestinians could not publicly disavow the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes, but that the "right of return" was nevertheless an unattainable fantasy.

On the issue of anti-Semitism, Sharon praised France for cracking down on anti-Semitic violence. Kornbluth reiterated that these measures impressed Israel.

He added that Israel appreciates France's efforts, in league with Britain and Germany, to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions and France's denunciation of the Iranian president's recent declarations that Israel should be wiped off the map and that the Holocaust is a myth.

Israel, as well, applauded France's support of United Nations resolution 1559, passed unanimously after the assassination of Lebanon's former prime minister, Rafik Hariri, in February 2005. The resolution, which demands a complete Syrian withdrawal from Lebanon and Hezbollah's disarmament, has yet to be fully implemented. Syria has pulled out its troops and intelligence agents, but Hezbollah, backed by Iran and Syria, refuses to disarm.

France also dealt Hezbollah a blow when its highest administrative court, the Council of State, ordered the operators of a French satellite station to stop broadcasting Hezbollah's television channel, Al-Manar. The court ruled that Al-Manar had violated French laws on racial incitement by broadcasting patently anti-Semitic content.

France and Israel, however, are still at odds over some key issues."We want France to exert more pressure on the Palestinian Authority to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure in the West Bank and Gaza," said Hassid, who was once posted to Israel's consulate in Montreal.

For its part, France has urged Israel to start fulfilling its obligations under the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan, but Sharon will not do so until the Palestinian leadership deals effectively with terrorism. In addition, France deplores the route of Israel's controversial security barrier, which snakes through the West Bank, and considers Israel's settlements in the territories to be an obstacle to peace. In this connection, Huntzinger said France opposes Israeli unilateral moves. France, too, believes that Israel's retaliation policy is counter-productive.

Huntzinger describes France's historic relationship with Israel in topographical terms. "There have been peaks and valleys – peaks in the 1950s and 1960s and valleys in the 1970s and 1980s."

A colonial power in the Mideast with geopolitical and economic interests in Lebanon, Syria and North Africa, France supported the United Nations 1947 Palestine partition plan.

During the 1950s, as it struggled to shore up its faltering position in Algeria and tried to topple Egypt's Abdel Gamel Nasser, France formed a strategic alliance with Israel. Israel's best friend during the 1950s and early 1960s, France sold weaponry – notably fighter aircraft, helicopters and missiles – to the Jewish state. France also supplied Israel with nuclear technology, while French technicians helped Israel build the Dimona reactor. In 1956, France and Britain colluded with Israel in the invasion of Egypt.

The honeymoon ended abruptly with the eruption of the 1967 Six Day War. Charles de Gaulle, the French president, had warned Israel not to resort to military means to deal with Egypt's sabre-rattling. When Israel attacked Egypt after weeks of hesitation, de Gaulle was furious, and in a major speech, he described Jews as an "elite people, sure of themselves and domineering." He then informed Israel that 50 Mirage jets and a handful of missile boats it had ordered and paid for would not be delivered after all.

David Kornbluth

Spurned by France, Israel embraced the United States as an arms supplier and ally. But during this period, much to France's indignation, Israel smuggled Mirage blueprints and five missile boats out of France. Nor did Israel endear itself to France by blowing up commercial aircraft in Beirut airport in a reprisal raid in December 1969.

France began to reassess its special relations with Israel in the wake of Algeria's independence in 1962. "De Gaulle wanted France to find its traditional place in the Arab world," explained Huntzinger.

De Gaulle's successors, Georges Pompidou and Valery Giscard d'Estaing, continued to distance France from Israel. "The presidency of d'Estaing was probably the most difficult time," Huntzinger acknowledged. "We looked at the Arab world as a source of oil. It was the moment when France took the European leadership on the Palestinian issue. French diplomacy showed no interest in engaging Israel."

France assisted Iraq in building a nuclear reactor and sold the Iraqis Mirage fighters. At the United Nations, France joined the Arab bloc in voting for anti-Israel resolutions. François Mitterrand, elected in 1981, was the first French president to pay an official visit to Israel. But he angered Menachem Begin, the Likud prime minister, by endorsing the concept of Palestinian statehood and by subsequently condemning Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon. Chirac, who became president in 1995, irritated Israel by demanding a larger European role in Mideast peacemaking.

Israel's relations with France took a turn for the better during the Oslo peace process, but deteriorated again with the start of the intifadah. In a sign of the times, France's ambassador to Britain, Daniel Bernard, while attending a dinner party, defamed Israel as a "shitty little country." Three years later, the French ambassador to Israel, Gerard Araud, charged that Israelis love to hate France.

Of late, there has been a refreshing absence of polemics as Israel and France have work harder to manage their often contentious relationship and strive to upgrade their $2 billion (US) annual volume of trade.

"We're in a process of reconciliation after years of differences," said Hassid, pithily summing up the current situation.

Community responds to campaign's focus on young people

UJA Federation Campaign 2006 expected to raise $58 million

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation cites the community's concern for children as one of the major reasons why the recently completed Campaign 2006 was so successful.

Chaired by Honey Sherman and Warren Kimel, with Linda Frum Sokolowski guiding Women's Campaign & Advocacy, Campaign 2006 is on pace to raise a final total of $58 million - an increase of $3 million over last year.

Toronto's UJA Federation campaign ranks as the third largest in North America behind only New York and Chicago.

According to Kimel, the pillars of Campaign 2006 - social justice, rebuilding Israeli lives, and connecting Jewish youth to Jewish life, clearly hit a nerve with donors.

"From the very start of the campaign - when Honey and I would canvass people - they knew that Jewish children were at the core, and they responded with warmth, understanding and compassion from the get-go. Knowing that our Campaign 2006 will alter the course of Jewish lives everywhere, and is contributing to a world of good, gives me a tremendous sense of fulfillment."

"As is often the case in many volunteer-driven organizations - with UJA Federation being no exception - none of us would have been as successful achieving our goals without the seamless dedication and support of the staff of UJA Federation," said Sherman. "What a fulfilling feeling it has been for me to chair Campaign 2006. I am truly the recipient of an indescribable experience."

UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy reached record results by raising more than $7.7 million through a variety of innovative programs and committed volunteers.

"We had an active, dedicated executive team," says Frum Sokolowski. "Each member came forward with great ideas and input. Our special Ofek L'Bagrut program to help the students of Kiryat Moshe (a neighbourhood of Rehovot) touched the hearts of all who heard about their situation. It was exciting to know that there was actually something we could do to help them."

Ofek L'Bagrut was initiated two years ago with funding from UJA Federation to provide private tutorials and hot meals to Ethiopian high school students so they could pass their high school matriculation exams, known in Hebrew as bagrut.

"This program inspired women to dig even deeper into their resources to help them out. I myself cry every time I think about the difference Campaign 2006 will make in the lives of these worthy young people," adds Frum Sokolowski.

Campaign 2007 will be chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks, with Judith Finer-Freedman as the chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy.

Israel Mission's a Family Affair

Seventy-five Torontonians made their way to Israel recently aboard the 10 day UJA Federation Winter Family Mission. Highlights of the mission included an emotional bar/bat mitzvah program where five children celebrated these milestones atop Masada. Ground broken at CHAT's new northern branch

By YONI GOLDSTEIN
UJA Federation

The sound of shovels recently breaking ground at the Lebovic Campus site of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) ushered in what promises to be a new and exciting era in Jewish education.

The new home of CHAT, located in what will be the Kimel Family Education Building on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus at Bathurst and Weldrick (north of Rutherford) in the city of Vaughan, is expected to be open for business for the 2007 school year.

The new community campus is an initiative of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Gerald Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum.

The two-storey CHAT building, which will sit on approximately 158,000 square feet of land, will feature among other facilities 25 classrooms, four science laboratories, a new library and an internal courtyard for school assemblies. At capacity, the site will be able to hold 900 students.

The school and the campus will meet the needs of Canada's fastest growing Jewish population. More than 60,000 Jews currently live in York Region and, according to a study commissioned by UJA Federation, nearly 100,000 Jews will live in the area within 10 years. In addition, the presence of day schools in Jewish neighbourhoods has become an increasingly powerful incentive for parents to select a day school education for their children.

CHAT's new Kimel Family Education Centre, part of the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, is expected to be ready for the 2007 school year.

"CHAT gives every student an opportunity to do well in his or her own right," says Zev Steinfeld, a Judaic Studies teacher at the school's current Richmond Hill campus. "Whatever a student's skill set, there is a way to be successful at our institution."

A major part of CHAT students' success, according to Steinfeld, is the school's wealth of extra-curricular activities and clubs.

"Our student programs - be they sports teams, charity initiatives or student-organized clubs - help to train our kids to be the next generation of conscious and responsible community leaders. There's always a positive attitude in the air at school, as I'm sure there will be on the Lebovic campus. It makes CHAT the kind of place that people want to be around."

"CHAT is the backbone of Jewish education in our city," says Paul Shaviv, CHAT's Director of Education. "Ultimately, we believe the Lebovic Campus will be an extraordinary centre of Jewish life," he adds. "We believe it will become the most intensive Jewish educational centre in North America."

"All signs suggest that Vaughan and York Region are the areas where the future growth will be for Toronto's Jewish community," explains Miguel Singer, chair of CHAT and UJA's Joint-Management Committee. "This new CHAT campus represents the anchor tenancy for the Tomorrow Campaign initiative. Our partnership with UJA has been the critical link in bringing CHAT's Lebovic Campus project forward. UJA Federation officials recognize the importance of Jewish education and how critical it is to the strength of our Jewish community."

Ariel Sharon: passionate about the Diaspora

Israeli PM values link with Toronto Jewish community

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

In his political career, and while he was healthy enough to govern the State of Israel, Ariel Sharon was known as a leader who not only understood the importance of a strong relationship with the Diaspora, but did everything he could to achieve that bond.

"The future of the Jewish people and the State of Israel depend on cooperating and tightening links with world Jewish communities. Each one of us shares in the responsibility for the future of the Jewish people," he once said.

Sharon, who has visited Toronto in the past, was sorry that he was unable to come to the city last November for the annual United Jewish Communities General Assembly (GA).

"He apologized to me when he realized he wouldn't be able to attend the GA when I last met with him in October," recalls Julia Koschitzky, the GA's International Chair. "He really wanted to make it; he was very aware of the importance of Toronto's Jewish community and how strong we are in the context of world Jewry. Mr. Sharon has always spoken of the importance of the Diaspora, and, no matter where you came from when he met with you, he would always make you feel as important as an Israeli citizen. He always made the time to meet with Diaspora leaders, no matter what."

Ariel Sharon

"There wasn't a single gathering with the Diaspora's leaders, philanthropists, families and children, where Prime Minister Sharon didn't begin his remarks with the words, 'I'm a Jew,'" says Zeev Bielski, Chairman of the Executive, The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner.

"He has always been a visionary leader who has devoted his whole life to building the country and protecting it, and sees the young generation as the most important asset and the main resource for the future of the Jewish people and the State of Israel."

In fact, Sharon has long been a passionate supporter of several Jewish Federation-backed initiatives, such as birthright israel, MASA and the aliyah of the Falas Mura.

Yossi Tanuri at work with Prime Minister Sharon

Sharon rarely missed a birthright israel mega-event and loved speaking with birthright participants from all over the world.

The vision of MASA, Hebrew for Journey, is that every year more and more young Jews from around the world will start their lives with a semester or a year in Israel, exploring the land, experiencing its culture while gaining a sense of belonging to Jewish life.

"I have a dream that every Jew will visit Jerusalem at least once," said Sharon. "I believe we must set a goal that every young Jew will live here at least one year during their lifetime."

The aliyah of the Falas Mura is another passion of Sharon's, made possible through the generosity of the Diaspora. The Falas Mura are Ethiopian Jews who converted to Christianity under threat or force. Over the past 10 years, at least 25,000 Falas Mura have immigrated to Israel and, at Sharon's urging, Israel will be bringing 20,000 more to the country by 2007. North American Jewish Federations will be raising $160 million over three years for this initiative.

"I met with Ariel Sharon on more than one occasion and, I must say, each time was a wonderful experience. He was a man of such vision, who was always aware of the importance of a strong bond between Israel and the Diaspora," says Leslie Gales, Past Chair of the Board, UJA Federation. "In fact, he called on the Diaspora to support Israel in whatever way we could after the start of the intifadah in 2001. He lived and breathed Israel; it was as if it was his child."

"Ariel Sharon is among the most beloved prime ministers in the history of the State of Israel and I am fortunate enough to say that he is a dear friend of mine," says Yossi Tanuri, Director General of the UIA Federations Canada Israel Office.

Leslie Gales, Past Chair of the Board, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto recently met with PM Sharon in Israel.

Painful and difficult days

In a recent letter sent to Diaspora leaders, Zeev Bielski, Chairman of the Executive, The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), offered these insights into Prime Minister Ariel Sharon

Dear Friends and Partners,

In these painful and difficult hours for the State of Israel, the Jewish people in Israel and in Jewish communities throughout the world are united in their prayers for Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's well being, and pray for his speedy recovery.

These hours are difficult and painful for us in the Jewish Agency, as we benefited from a Prime Minister who devoted all his might to the welfare of the Jewish people, who believed in a shared destiny and gave us the support and strength to fulfill our goals.

Many of you were privileged to meet the Prime Minister and came to know the depth of his commitment to the Jewish people and to all Jewish communities. There wasn't a single gathering with the Diaspora's leaders, philanthropists, families with children, where he didn't begin his remarks with the words, "I'm a Jew," and presented his vision for strengthening the Jewish people's ties to the State of Israel and for expanding the common denominator which has bound us together for thousand of years.

Zeev Bielski

During the week of Chanukah, I met the Prime Minister three times. We lit Chanukah candles with MASA youth participants, with EYALIM representatives, pioneer students, who are fulfilling the dream of settling the Negev, and with the youth of ATIDIM, a program for promoting youth in the periphery towards academic studies and towards their integration into the IDF and into Israel society.

It is not a coincidence that these were our meetings with the Prime Minister, a visionary leader, who has devoted his whole life to building the country and protecting it, and sees the young generation as the most important asset and the main resource for the future of the Jewish people and the prosperity of the State of Israel.

The Prime Minister is personally an inspiring figure, who strengthens my faith and my ability to face the challenges confronting the Jewish Agency, and serves as a bridge between the State of Israel, the Israeli Government and the Jewish people in the Diaspora.

Ariel Sharon personifies the generation who fought to establish the State of Israel; Ariel Sharon, who worked to achieve a new dawn of peace, who created new challenges in building the country, developing the Galilee and the Negev, integrating youth into the mission at the center of our country's national agenda and strengthening the ties which bind us to our brethren throughout the world. On behalf of the Jewish people in all of Israel communities, and on behalf of all the warm, wonderful people who wrote us, we pray for the Prime Minister's recovery.

Send your Best Wishes to Prime Minister Sharon

Kadis seeks re-election in largest Jewish riding

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

In Canada's most Jewish riding, two of the three major candidates say domestic issues such as gun violence and health care are taking precedence over Canada-Israel relations.

Election 2006

Roughly 42 per cent of the 117,000 residents of Thornhill are Jewish, and there are significant Orthodox pockets in and around the Spring Farm community.

The riding is home to five Jewish day schools, a yeshiva and at least a half-dozen synagogues, with a strong presence from Chabad.

Created in 1996, Thornhill is bounded by Highway 404 in the east, Highway 400 in the west, Steeles Avenue in the south and Rutherford Road and Highway 7 in the north.

Manufacturing and retail are the main employers. Average family income is nearly $80,000 and unemployment is 4.9 per cent.

The incumbent, Liberal Susan Kadis, was one of five Jewish MPs in the last House of Commons. A former public school trustee and City of Vaughan councillor, she won the riding in the June, 2004 election by more than 10,000 votes over Conservative Josh Cooper, who is now executive director of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee. But Cooper polled more votes (18,125) than the combined totals for the Canadian Alliance and Progressive Conservative candidates in the 2000 election (nearly 13,000).

This time, Kadis, 53, is running against Anthony Reale, a real estate and development consultant who's carrying the Conservative banner; the NDP's Simon Strelchik, a community activist; Green Party hopeful Lloyd Helferty, who polled 1,622 votes in 2004; and student Mark Abramowitz of the Progressive Canadian Party, which stresses fiscal conservatism and progressive social policies.

Kadis says health care and urban violence are issues she hears about from voters. She adds that as chair of the standing committee on the status of women and as associate member of the standing committee on health, human resources and skills development, she's attuned to health and social issues.

In October 2004, Kadis was elected chair of the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) Liberal Caucus, and notes that she is playing a strong role in the development of a comprehensive urban strategy to contain violence.

But on Israel, Kadis says she "hasn't encountered too much" concern.

"Most people are aware that I've been a strong voice" on Israel. "I have represented those issues. I said I would stand up and speak out on issues of importance to the Thornhill community and I have. I do what I said I was going to do," she told The CJN.

"Not only am I a Jewish Canadian, I also represent a riding with the highest percentage of Jewish people in Canada."

Kadis said she asked Prime Minister Paul Martin "directly" for funds to combat racism and anti-Semitism. The result was an anti-racism program announced last fall that is slated to receive $56 million over five years.

Kadis is certain of where Martin stands on Israel.

Susan Kadis

"I know that our prime minister and our government [are] a friend of Israel. One-hundred percent. There is no doubt in my mind. And I've been working there on the inside. So I've had a unique opportunity to see first-hand what is actually going on."

She also says she was "instrumental" in influencing the recent shift of some of Canada's votes at the United Nations to a more pro-Israel position.

Kadis also cites the Liberals' promises on social programs.

"We have established some groundbreaking partnerships in the area of health care, child care and a new deal for cities. They are unprecedented and bode well for the future."

Anthony Reale

Reale, 59, has also served as a Vaughan city councillor, from 1984 to 1988 and ran unsuccessfully for mayor in 1988. Asked why he wants to return to politics, he doesn't hesitate.

"The Liberal Party and Susan Kadis got me back into this... When I see the things going on in Parliament, I just could not sit there and accept the fact that in a democratic nation like Canada, the incumbent would have the arrogance of feeling such entitlement, without any red face or any shame, to come back and say 'I want you to re-elect me.'

"We cannot send a message that we reward that kind of attitude. Plus, I think that the Conservative Party has a great platform."

Simon Strelchik

Reale says that in about 80 per cent of the riding's Jewish neighbourhoods, Israel is the top issue.

Local Jews "are very upset at the Liberals making these off-the-cuff remarks and suggesting that, 'Yes we're friends of Israel,' but really acting completely differently. It a very strong issue."

The Tories, he says, have a solid record on Israel, and the "political will to affect change" on Canada's Mideast policy.

"I am surely an advocate of that and motivated to see that happen."

Reale favours revisiting same-sex marriage issue

Reale says same-sex marriage comes up in Orthodox areas of the riding. He supports revisiting the issue, even though it's the law of the land, and he would vote against allowing gays to marry.

"I would not come to your home and say, 'You have a traditional of lighting your menorah on Chanukah and I want you to stop.' It's not right.

"Marriage has been a tradition both in religious circles and in people's lives for generations. If marriage is so important for so many members of our society, let's not undermine it for them."

NDP candidate has long list of community involvement

Strelchik, who's studying politics at Ryerson University, tallies a long list of community involvement. At 13, he was a founding member of Free the Children, the child advocacy group made famous by Craig Kielburger.

Strelchik is also a past chair of the York Region Health Services Youth Advisory Board, and past member of Vaughan council's Youth Advisory Committee. He's been a vocal anti-smoking activist and was chief organizer for three years at his school of the 30 Hour Famine, which raised money for impoverished children.

He's noticed a lot of interest in the riding in child care and curbing hand guns.

"The Liberals have underfunded the police" he says, "but we can't ignore the social context of gun crime. We need more funding for local youth programs."

He says he hasn't encountered too much discussion about Israel.

"Things have settled down a bit for both sides. This is one of the first elections [in which] Israel is not on people's minds."

And he defends his party's policies on the Middle East.

"The NDP is not anything but pro-Israel. We are pro-Israel and pro-peace."

Names and the essence of identity

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

The book of Exodus is so named because it depicts Israel's exodus from Egypt. The English names for the books of the Torah relate to the main contents of the book. However, in Hebrew, the books of the Torah are not named based on their content. Rather, the first word of the text designates the name. Shmot (Names), is the first word of the book of Exodus, thus the name of the book in Hebrew is Shmot.

Genesis shows us the importance of names. The first activity that God and Adam do together is name all the creatures. Names complete the being and speak of the essence and destiny of the person. Traditionally, we are very careful about the names we give our children, since the name, the essence and the destiny will combine to form the identity of the child. With all this said, it is not inconsequential that the Hebrew title of the second book of the Torah translates as "Names."

The book begins by stating: "These are the names of the children of Israel who came to Egypt with Jacob." The text then lists the names of Jacob's sons. However, we knew this list of names from the end of Genesis. Jacob's entire family has been living in Egypt for some time before Genesis ends. The list of names is not giving us new information, but it is introducing a new message. When we entered Egypt, we had a clear sense of identity. Our names were clearly known.

As the Torah narrative continues, we are told that a new Pharaoh arose in Egypt who did not know Joseph. If Joseph was the second-in-command in Egypt, a man of significant station, how could a new Pharaoh not be aware of him? The midrash and commentaries offer many possible explanations. The Torah continues with a description of the enslavement of the Israelites and the birth of Moses.

What is most interesting about these texts is that no one involved in the story is referred to by name. Moses' parents are identified as a man from Levi and a daughter of Levi. Miriam is referred to as the sister. Moses' adopted mother is referred to as Pharaoh's daughter. The absence of any name is quite striking to the reader and only gets resolved when Moses is named.

The message of the text begins with the list of Jacob's sons and continues through to the birth of Moses. The list of names at the beginning of the book reminds us that when Jacob's children went to Egypt, they had a clear sense of identity. By the time Israel is enslaved, there are no names – there is no clear identity. How did the Israelites get this way? The key lies with Joseph.

Genesis describes the moment of Joseph's promotion from a slave to an Egyptian government official. The promotion included a name change, in which Pharaoh gives Joseph an Egyptian name. It's likely that from then onward, Joseph is referred to in Egypt by his Egyptian name alone. The new Pharaoh who arose in Egypt and did not know Joseph probably knew Joseph the man but not Joseph the name. The new Pharaoh would only have known Joseph, the Egyptian official, by his Egyptian name.

Joseph, the first Jew forced into exile, introduces the dual identity that reflects the Jewish exile reality. Having gone to Egypt with a clear sense of identity, we watch as an element of confusion is introduced that ultimately results in a lack of names – a lost identity.

When Moses is born, and subsequently named, the Torah tells us that the issue will find resolution through this man. Moses will bring the Torah to the Jews, and it is that document that moulds our identity for all time.

The importance of sticking together

By JAY SOLOMON

Guest Voice

Admittedly, I am not the most religious young man the Jewish faith has ever produced.

I don't attend synagogue regularly; typically only going on the High Holy Days. I do not keep kosher, I don't wear a kippah outside of shul, and I always feel a little bit guilty when I drive down the street and see religious Jews walking to services for a holiday.

Despite this, however, I am a vocal supporter of Israel who has published countless articles defending our homeland from the kind of vicious attacks that have become politically correct these days. I am a supporter of many Jewish community organizations, and even sit on the board of directors of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Though I may not be overly religious, I do feel intrinsically tied to the Jewish community. As such, I never thought I would ever date someone outside my religion. With the Jewish population on the decline globally, the rising anti-Semitism both at home and abroad, and the growing threat our very existence continues to face, I have long felt that interfaith dating was not something our community should promote. Thus, over the years, I have made it my policy not to date non-Jewish women. Yet, this past summer, I found myself doing just that.

If there is one thing about love that I know for sure, it is that love has a way of clouding your thinking; a way of making black and white into grey and right and wrong into "acceptable." As a strong believer in black and white, and right and wrong, this grey area made me uncomfortable. As the relationship progressed, I began to remember why I didn't want to date outside the Jewish religion. Of course, part of the reason was religious differences, like celebrating Chanukah instead of Christmas, and going to shul instead of church. But, for me, the most important reason had more to do with social and cultural differences than anything else.

By that, I do not intend to suggest that the Jewish faith is intolerant of other cultures; certainly it is not. In fact, Israel is the only country in the Middle East that actively supports a plurality of religious and cultural practices. But people who have grown up in the Jewish community understand the challenges our people face, and the norms of our culture, in a way that non-Jews cannot. Jewish people understand what it feels like to have national leaders such as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad stand up and state that Israel should be "wiped off the map."

Jewish students understand what it feels like when tenured university professors stand behind a podium and claim that Israel is no better than Al Qaeda. Jewish grandchildren, whose grandparents or great-grandparents were incinerated in the Nazi death chambers, understand what genocide is all about. Jewish children, who have to practise terrorism drills at school, understand what it feels like to be afraid. Jews, the world over, understand the occasional placing of a Yiddish word in a sentence that really could have been uttered solely in English.

As Jews, we know our mothers are overprotective; we know chicken soup is not complete without matzah balls; we know Christmas Eve is the best time to go to a movie theater; we know family get-togethers will always produce leftovers; and we know that pronouncing words that begin with "ch" will inevitably result in a certain amount of spitting.

As members of the Jewish community, we are tied together in socially, politically and religiously significant ways. We face the same dangers, celebrate the same joys, mourn the same sorrows and dream the same dreams. This "connection" unites us with a sense of belonging that is irreplaceable.

My friends, who travelled in Europe last summer, tell a story of how they were walking around and happened to come across a community where its inhabitants were having a Shabbat meal. The locals invited my friends off the street to join them for lunch and engage in conversation. It is this kind of connection – a sense that we are all Jews – that reminds me of the importance of sticking together.

Movin' on up to the Holy Land

Guest Voice

By ALISON EPSTEIN

The theme song from the 1970s TV show The Jeffersons has been playing in the background of my life for weeks. In quiet moments – which are rare in a home shared with a three-year-old and a five-year-old – I hear the words: "Well, we're movin' on up…"

But instead of the Jeffersons, who went "to the East Side, to a deee-luxe apartment in the sky," the Epsteins have moved to a small rental house in Yatzitz, a moshav that is also Israel's UFO capital. (Google it to see what I mean.)

Still, we're movin' on up. That's what aliyah is all about. Not that I expect our standard of living to improve, by any stretch of the imagination. Rather, I expect that life will be much tougher in Israel than it was in polite and prosperous Canada.

The curious – Jew and non-Jew, alike – ask: Why have we done this?

The pioneers' descendant that I am would like to answer: Why not?

I've always been a wandering sort, up for adventure, having moved from Texas to Missouri to Ohio to New York to Canada.

But thrill-seeking and a change of scenery are not the reasons for this move. For starters, I'm not the only one involved. Unlike my previous moves, I have a husband and children now. Secondly, "thrill" is a relative term, especially when you're 43, not 23.

Was it the weather?

No. Frankly, I was relieved to leave the heat and humidity behind in Texas.

So, nu? Why?

It comes down to a belief that Israel is our Jewish home. Furthermore, my husband Stephen and I believe that the most complete expression of Jewish life can only occur while residing in the Land of Israel. Hence, we're movin' on up to a deeper expression and understanding of Judaism.

After so many centuries of hoping for a return to Israel, and davening for it daily, Jews can finally come home. And Jews worldwide should take Hashem up on His promise to give this land to His people.

That's what we did. As we were making the important decision about whether to make aliyah now, I prayed that if Hashem wanted us in Israel, He would make it happen.

Door after door opened for us: as we took action toward making aliyah, our anticipated obstacles failed to live up to our expectations. Our motto became: "You have to put your toe in the water before the sea will part."

No doubt, there will be times when it will feel like the water is up to our nostrils. At those times, we will have hold onto the rope of certainty – that Hashem wants us there – long enough to see the waters part.

And they will.

We hope many others will follow us, in the same way that we followed those who have already moved on up.

Indeed, now is a good time for Jews in Toronto to make aliyah. Despite the valiant efforts of those who battle for equity in education, I doubt Ontario will ever fund non-Catholic religious education – certainly not to the satisfaction of the already-squeezed middle-class.

And now is a good time for Jews in the United States and elsewhere in Canada to make aliyah. Never in history have so many Jews had the ability to run to a place – rather than run from a place – with more than the shirts on their backs.

It's a glory age that will one day end.

History will repeat itself, as it always does. I wish it weren't so, but the signs are already there: in France, in Iran (witness the laughable rhetoric coming from that country's president – laughable, that is, until you remember he leads a country with nuclear ambitions), in Argentina, and even in Montreal.

Anti-Semitism is on the rise again, as if it ever really went away. Though brave people attempt to beat it back, hatred always lurks in darkened corners. Waiting.

I don't know if we'll see horrors like those of the past in our lifetimes, but it's very possible my children and grandchildren will. May their strength be found with Hashem and with our numbers in Israel.

We hope you'll be joining us very soon.

Alison Epstein boarded a Nefesh b'Nefesh flight to Israel on Dec. 27 with husband Stephen and daughters Zoe Noa and Maayan Chana.

Israeli podcasts, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Every few weeks, I like to catch up with my friends, a couple of American olim named Harry and Ziva, to find out what life really is like in Israel. Not just politics but maybe Ziva mouthing off about wild Israeli drivers or Harry salivating over which Israeli chocolate bars are best. That's when I feel I'm getting the real pulse of the country.

The funny thing is that although I know all about them, I've never met Ziva or Harry. And they have no idea who I am. The couple runs a podcast from their home in Modin and have developed a following of hundreds (thousands?) of listeners worldwide.

Harry and Ziva produce the View from Here, one of the many podcasts that have sprung up over the past year or so. If you've never listened to a podcast, think of it as a free radio show that you can download and listen to on your computer or an a portable MP3 player such as an iPod. And if you really enjoy a podcast, you can subscribe to it.

As for the quality of podcasts, they can rival the best documentaries you'll hear anywhere. Or they can sound like they were recorded on a kitchen table (because many are.) Today, I'm going to suggest which podcasts are worth listening to. As to how to listen to them, there are many good sites that will walk you through the process such as wikiHow [http://tinyurl.com/b2918], ilounge [http://tinyurl.com/79cad] and Wikipedia. [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Podcast]

And now back to my friends Harry and Ziva: They are completely relaxed in front of the microphone. Completely. And that means they don't censor what they say. I find the language always engaging but it certainly is explicit. As they say on their site, "It's a comedy show and is not intended for children, the easily offended or self-hating Jews. Except Woody Allen. He's funny. In an endearing self-deprecating 'I hate my Jewish self' kind of way." [http://feeds.feedburner.com/TheViewFromHere]

You won't hear such language uttered by Carol and Charley. They're another American couple who made aliyah but their Israelisms Podcast travels at a more leisurely pace. When I last listened in, they delivered the weather in rhyming verse and then talked at length about the political landscape of Israel after Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's stroke. Carol and Charley's tone is gentle, but that doesn't mean they don't award a regular Moron of the Week. Current winner: Rev. Pat Robertson. [http://www.israelisms.com/] Every so often, Israelisms goes on the road and broadcast from sites such as the Kotel, Machane Yehuda market or in search of Ramle's best hummus.

The Lironcast Podcast is light on politics and heavy on tech news, pop culture and science. Liron says, "I'm 23 years old and am podcasting from a small suburb of Tel Aviv… I work in print and fashion design and am an ex-soldier for the Israeli military, with all the good and bad that goes with it. I'm a geek, a nerd, a four-eyes, I like to talk about things like operating systems, comic books, gadgets, science fiction, digital art and sex (occasionally)." Liron is fast talking. She does get her point across, but my head is still spinning. [http://www.lironbot.com/podcast/]

If you'd like to practise your Hebrew listening skills, then you can subscribe to Tcast – the Hebrew Technology Podcast. [http://tcast.blogspot.com/] Meanwhile, popular culture, music and comics come under the scrutiny of Kitaro's Sideshow. [http://sideshow.libsyn.com/]

Want less popular culture and more politics? You'll get plenty from these two podcasts. At Israellycool, Dave tells you what's "inside the mind of an Ozrieli." [http://www.israellycool.com/blog/Podcasts] And the Marty Roberts Show starts with politics but can head off in almost any direction, including topics such as anti-Semitism, kashrut and why levels of Jewish tourism to Israel are too low. [http://tinyurl.com/dydk4] With five podcasts per week, Marty never seems to be at a loss for words. But to tell you the truth, there really aren't enough hours in the day to listen regularly to all the podcasts I've mentioned. After you sample a few of them, you'll find yourself gravitating to the ones that are original and stimulating – and the others will probably fall by the wayside.

Next time, the best podcasts for listening to Jewish music and learning a bit of Torah.

THE PROMISED LAND, published in 1912 to universal acclaim, is the memoir of Mary Antin. A classic account of a young woman who leaves a small Russian town to settle in Boston, Antin offers provocative observations about living in two cultures and the struggle to reconcile her heritage with her fledgling identity in the New World.

New egalitarian minyan aimed at young Jews

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Kehilat Or Hadash, a new egalitarian minyan based in Toronto, is helping young Jews reconnect with their community, said Daniel Held, one of the organizers.

"People who haven't been engaged in tfillah in a long time are becoming involved again," said Held, 23, who graduated six months ago from York University's Jewish education program and is currently the co-director of student activities at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill campus.

"People who haven't thought about how they want to do Shabbat, and how they want to be involved in the Jewish community, are doing that again and that is really positive."

Michelle Landy, a 22-year-old law student at Osgood Hall at York, Aaron Kasman, 24, a software developer who graduated from the University of Toronto two years ago, and Held were inspired to start a minyan for young Jews because they wanted to create a community where everyone could feel comfortable.

"I want it to be a comfortable place for those who come in every way we can. Everyone has had experiences where we've been made to feel uncomfortable in minyans in the city," Landy said.

"I think being told the proper way to dress [can make someone uncomfortable]. 'Your skirt's too short, your sleeves are too big,' or the opposite, 'Why are you dressed like such a frummy?' I've gotten both."

While Kasman agreed that making people comfortable is important, he also hoped that other young Jews, who like himself, are looking for ways to do Jewish on their own terms, will be inspired by the minyan.

"I grew up with my family going to Adath Israel [Congregation], and I really had a sense of frustration there, when I grew up with the institution, with the services," he said.

"I really wanted to be part of a community with people who are happy where they are davening and be inspired by their davening and be involved in their davening, and [where they] have a say in their religious community."

Held hopes the minyan will serve as an example to other young Jews that it is important to create your own outlets.

"If we can start with the idea that we can create our own Jewish communities and we can think about how we're going to do Shabbat and how we are going to do Tfillah… that's valuable."

"At some point, we need to mature and to figure out what we want and make our own Jewish experiences," Held said.

"I mean, you can't rely on your mother to make chicken soup every week. At some point, you need to make your own chicken soup."

The next minyan, scheduled for Jan. 28 at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at U of T, is only the fourth one, but Landy said they've enjoyed an impressive turnout since their first minyan last October.

"We've had over 50 people for every minyan. Anywhere from about 55 to 80 every single time," she said, adding that they do everything they can to make sleeping arrangements for all who want to participate.

"I've had mothers come up to me and say, 'I'm so happy you guys are doing this.'"

While the purpose of Kehilat Or Hadash (congregation of new light) is meant to give people more options when in comes to "doing Jewish," Held said that the minyan isn't about working against shuls, but trying to work with them.

"One of the things that has been really great is that a lot of shuls in the past couple months have spoken to us about what we're doing, why we're doing it and how we get young people engaged in tfillah.

"We learn a lot from the big shuls and the big shuls learn a lot from us, both in terms of what we do do and in terms of what we don't do," he added.

"We make sure that there aren't those people sitting in the back row, telling you what to wear, what to do, how to daven," Landy said.

"If you want to daven at your own pace, there is a comfortable place to do that."

Landy said that the community has been so supportive of the minyan, that people have been donating money to their "kiddush fund," while others have even offered their homes as a place to meet, and Hillel of Greater Toronto has been "bending over backward" to accommodate them in any way they can.

While the response has been very positive, from Jews young and old, Landy said that most important thing is that they are contributing to their community.

"It's a really great feeling to see that we are building our own future, that we are adding something to our community," Landy said.

Toronto couple celebrates 72 years of marriage

By KYLE GORDON
CJN Intern

In 1934, Sam Kalchman promised his future mother-in-law that he would care for her daughter, Toby, forever.

The couple wed on Jan. 7, 1934, and after 72 years of marriage Sam, 92, has more than fulfilled his promise.

"He has been taking care of me since the day we met. He still does the grocery shopping for me," said Toby, 90.

At 19, Sam knew that the 17-year-old brown-eyed beauty would become his life partner. He first laid eyes on her at his brother's wedding and immediately began courting her.

"I went to the wedding and Sam didn't let go of me. He wouldn't let me spend time with my friends," recalled Toby.

After the wedding, Toby returned to her small town in Poland, but Sam's persistence did not falter. "He sent me letters every day asking me to live with him. Oy, did he send letters," she said.

Eventually, Toby agreed to move in with Sam and his family. "We fell in love, so we married – why not?" said Toby.

The details of the wedding are still fresh in her mind. Toby vividly remembers the old rabbi holding the marriage licence that her uncle brought to the wedding. "He was the oldest man I had ever seen. He looked 100 years old," said Toby.

"He probably was," Sam added.

The rabbi blessed the newly married couple and said, "I wish that you live as long as I live."

Toby and Sam smiled as they recalled the rabbi's sentiments. "Now, we are almost the same age as the rabbi," Sam said to Toby, chuckling. "But you are still the same beauty that I married."

In November 1948, following Rosh Hashanah, Sam and Toby fled Russia, – where they had lived after leaving Poland – with their two young daughters, Eva and Helen. They moved to Canada and stayed with Toby's sister, Silvia. Sam started pressing dresses in a little shop on Spadina Avenue.

"I was a hard worker. Nothing was too much for me," said Sam.

"It's true," Toby chimed in. "He always worked very hard."

Toby and Sam opened a little grocery store in the east end of Toronto. Toby worked as the cashier and Sam purchased the produce.

"We always worked together, in life and in the store. No one ever gave us anything, so we had to work hard to give our children an education," said Sam.

Then they took a moment to look around the dining room of their Thornhill condo, at the family photos on the walls. "We have come a long way from the time when we only had a little steel bed and a table," said Toby.

They feel fortunate to have three children, six grandchildren and 15 great-grandchildren. They are proud of their family and eager to boast about their children's academic achievements, reminisce about their grandchildren's weddings, and describe the precious details of the day-to-day life of their great- grandchildren.

'They are real characters'

But their family feels equally blessed to have them. "They are loving parents. The children have always been the number 1 priority," said Marvin Kalchman, Toby and Sam's son.

"They are real characters. My children love spending time with them," said Murray Nightingale, Sam and Toby's grandson.

"My grandfather has never been one to sit around. I am so impressed by his youthfulness," he said.

A few years ago, Nightingale returned home from work to find the family sukkah in pieces. He asked his wife how this happened and she told him that Sam came by to help them collapse the sukkah.

"My grandfather has such incredible strength. At 89, he was taking down a heavy sukkah" said Nightingale. "He's amazing."

Sam and Toby continue to stay active. Toby plays cards with a group of women in the condo and Sam just renewed his diver's licence for another two years.

Harsh realities forced Sharon's hand

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Following Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's severe stroke on Jan. 4, a flood of media analysis sought to answer one question: What does Sharon's illness and possible death mean for "the peace process"?

Although Sharon spoke of the hope for eventual peaceful relations with the Palestinians, he was not involved in a peace process for the simple reason that such a process no longer exists. The bilateral negotiations as envisioned in UN Security Council Resolution 242 ("land for peace") collapsed due to the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's rejection of the Camp David/Taba proposals and the subsequent war of terror against Israelis. The moribund "road map" peace plan has failed to provide a viable alternative.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Arafat's successor, has spoken about his commitment to peace with Israel – even communicating this message in Arabic to his own people, unlike his predecessor. But Abbas has proven to be a totally ineffective leader, too weak to check the chaos and violence roiling within the PA.

Israelis are understandably skeptical that Abbas can be a reliable partner to deliver the peace and security that are the counterpart to Israel's significant territorial concessions. Thus Sharon felt compelled to act alone, to do what was necessary to preserve Israel as both Jewish and democratic while trying to manage the conflict with the Palestinians by reducing points of friction as much as possible. This was the rationale behind Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and parts of the northern West Bank this past summer.

So rather than a "peace process," Sharon was, of necessity, involved in a stabilizing process – conflict management, rather than conflict resolution. This reflects an important strategic shift, which has been acknowledged in some media commentaries.

In "Sharon's departure will change very little" (Globe and Mail, Jan. 7) Edward Luttwak, a senior fellow at the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies, wrote that while negotiations are preferable to unilateral actions, "so long as the President of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, and his government do not enforce the monopoly of force that any state must have, they cannot be negotiating partners… Mr. Abbas keeps saying that he refuses to risk starting a Palestinian civil war – yet, without one, there can be no real Palestinian state.

"But there can still be further [unilateral] Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank with or without Mr. Sharon because that is what the decisive majority of Israelis demand."

In "What do Israelis do now?" (Globe and Mail, Jan. 6) Shira Herzog wrote: "Mr. Sharon both formed and reflected the twin planks of the 'post-Oslo, post-intifadah' Israeli consensus: first, Israel has to significantly reduce the number of Palestinians it controls… and second, because it has no trustworthy Palestinian partners for negotiations to resolve the conflict, Israel must act alone to protect its interests and reduce friction."

In a New York Times article ("In the Shadow of Sharon," Jan. 6), Israeli historian Benny Morris wrote: "Many expected, and some feared, that Mr. Sharon would continue with… unilateral steps to separate the two peoples and physically consolidate two separate states. Unilateral, because he believed (as I do) that there was and is no viable Palestinian peace partner. The Palestinian national movement, he believed, still in its deepest, immutable recesses of its heart, aspires to Israel's destruction and replacement by an Arab-majority state, a 'one-state solution.'"

The possibility that Hamas, dedicated to Israel's destruction, could grab a large share of power in the upcoming Palestinian elections only adds to Morris's pessimistic assessment.

Since election 2004, at the United Nations, Canada:

I. Changed 6 votes on problematic resolutions targeting Israel at the General Assembly (GA).

II. Helped withdraw a seventh resolution from consideration in 2005.

III. Co-sponsored Israel's Nov. 21, 2005 GA resolution to establish an International Day of Commemoration in memory of the victims of the Holocaust.

IV. Focused international attention on human rights violations in Iran through yearly GA resolutions.

V. Called for the replacement of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, which unfairly chastises Israel while overlooking serious human rights violators like Iran, with a Human Rights Council comprised of responsible nations.

Building Regional Ties

Minister Cotler established the Middle East - 4, bringing together for the first time the Justice Ministers from Egypt, Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority for an Annual Dialogue on Justice, hosted by Canada.

Canada-Israel bilateral partnership is booming:

- As a developed country Israel needs trade-not aid. We are signatory to the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement, trading $1 billion annually.
- The Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation has been a great success and has been renewed until 2010 by Ministers Peterson, Emerson and Pettigrew.
- Minister Dryden is currently negotiating an agreement on pensions with Israel.

Canada Helps Palestinians to Help Themselves:

Canada recognizes that peace cannot be achieved without a credible Palestinian partner. That is why in 2005, Prime Minister Martin pledged $36.7 million to the PA to help build their capacity to govern, assist their people and implement their commitments. Israel has welcomed Canada's increased assistance to the Palestinians.

"Israel's Values are Canada's Values"

On November 13th 2005, Prime Minister Paul Martin addressed the General Assembly of Jewish Leaders in Toronto. The following are excerpts from his speech:

...all of us have been alarmed with the number of antisemitic outbursts and outbreaks in our cemeteries, in our synagogues, in our schools. Let me just tell you that when a synagogue, a school, or a cemetery is attacked in Canada, that is an attack on every single one of us.

... increasingly the global community is coming to recognize, each in its own way, what we have understood in Canada for some time now – that Israel's values are Canada's values; shared values of democracy, the rule of law and the protection of human rights.

And these same values are reflected in Israel's understanding of the obligations nations have to one another. Canada has for many years supported Israel's rightful place in the international community, including at the United Nations, and we will continue to press for the kinds of reforms that will eliminate the politicization of the United Nations and its agencies, and in particular the annual, ritual of politicized, anti-Israel resolutions...

Just as we are vigilant within our nations, among them we must stand united against antisemitism in all its forms. When you attack the State of Israel, you attack, what is for so many, the soul of the Jewish people.

For this reason we spoke out immediately, and I do so again here in this room, as I did in the Parliament of Canada, against the reprehensible posturing of the President of Iran. Canada will not stand for such hateful speech, or its implications. Let me be very clear. This threat to Israel's existence; this call for genocide, coupled with Iran's obvious nuclear ambitions is a matter that the world cannot ignore. And Iran must know, in no uncertain terms, that the free nations of the world will not tolerate its intransigence. ..."

Hillel-sponsored study looks at 'millennials'

that Jews have – all of these factors play into a greater assimilation."

By understanding how the millennial generation is thinking, Jewish institutions can cater to them rather than try to get young Jews to participate on their terms.

Dainow agreed that the institutions should be more open to the non-traditional ways that young Jews are involving themselves in the community.

"The unwillingness of 'establishment Judaism' to include young questioning Jews – or just questioning Jews generally – in its mandates and worldview [is a problem]," she said.

"This unwillingness becomes particularly problematic in terms of early Jewish education and its availability outside of expensive Jewish day schools," she said, adding that information about different Jewish options is not easily accessible.

"I think when people who otherwise would observe in some way don't, it's often because they don't think they have any options outside of standard synagogue or student-group environments that don't work for them. Things like progressive chavurahs and vegan potluck Shabbat groups can be hard to find, and even harder to start up if you don't have the base of interested Jewish friends in the first place," she said.

But Kaye, along with the Hillel houses on campuses all over North America, are dedicated to addressing this issue as best they can.

"The idea is to get people to express themselves Jewishly in whatever way they feel comfortable," Kaye said.

Lewis urges Jews to help tackle crises in Africa

By KYLE GORDON
CJN Intern

Jews and other Canadians should take a leading role in mobilizing the United Nations to act on the various crises in Africa, Stephen Lewis, the UN's special envoy on HIV/AIDS in Africa, told a hushed audience at the University of Toronto last week.

"Africa continues to be betrayed by the international community. This pattern of betrayal has not stopped," said Lewis, whose Jan. 10 talk at U of T's Isabel Bader Theatre was part of Focus Africa, a day-long event organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto in partnership with other campus groups.

Stephen Lewis

He noted that in 2000, the UN General Assembly adopted the UN Millennium Declaration, which outlined global goals to be reached by 2015. They included reducing maternal mortality by 75 per cent, decreasing the mortality rate of children under five by 66 per cent, and beginning to reverse the spread of AIDS and to provide special assistance to children orphaned by the disease.

"None of these things will be achieved on the African continent," Lewis said. "There is rapid and precipitous decline in Africa."

He said that each night in the Gulu district of northern Uganda, 44,000 rural children, known as night commuters, flee their homes and walk eight to 10 kilometres to hide from the Lord's Resistance Army, a rebel group that has already abducted some 20,000 children.

"This is a complete desecration of children. The situation is so appallingly terrible," Lewis said.

The crisis in Uganda has parallels with Rwanda, he said. "It is almost beyond comprehension that Rwanda is being repeated again in Darfur [Sudan] and Uganda."

Lewis then turned his attention to the HIV/AIDS in Africa. "The reality of death in the continent is overwhelming," he said.

Lewis, who visits Africa frequently, recalled moments when the continent felt like a morgue and its hospitals like a version of Dante's hell.

"Africa is in a perilous situation and none of it is necessary," he said, noting there is enough anti-AIDS medication available to help people and there is no reason Africans with HIV/AIDS can't live longer, he added.

A few months ago, Lewis visited a clinic in Rwanda where hundreds of people were receiving treatment.

"Treatment can be done. We know how to do it. We are allowing the continent to die. It is absolutely heartbreaking," he said.

Africa's HIV/AIDS epidemic is taking lives, but it's also creating millions of orphans, and grandparents, aunts, uncles, siblings and even children are forced to care for them, Lewis said.

"You can not believe the heroic nature of these people."

Lewis said spending hundreds of billions on war when there is a continent that can be saved for far less is not right.

"We are not responding. I beg you to turn this around," he urged.

Jonathan Laski, media relations director of the Canadian group Students Taking Action Now Darfur (STAND), spoke after Lewis and encouraged the audience to contact candidates in the upcoming federal election and demand action on the humanitarian crisis in Darfur, Sudan, where thousands have been killed and more than two million driven from their homes since a revolt began in early 2003 by non-Arab villagers who accused the Khartoum government of neglect and repression.

"Darfur is an opportunity to heal the world," said Laski, referring to the mitzvah of tikkun olam, the theme of the Focus Africa event.

Hotel Rwanda hero calls for action on Darfur

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Repeating the words "never again" is not enough when it comes to preventing genocides like the one now taking place in the Darfur region of Sudan, says the man who inspired the film Hotel Rwanda.

"Raise awareness. Write petitions and sign them. Go to the streets and demonstrate," said Paul Rusesabagina, 51, who saved 1,200 Tutsis and moderate Hutus from being slaughtered by Hutu extremists in Rwanda in 1994.

As part of a program organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto called Focus Africa, some 300 people gathered at York University's Founders Assembly Hall last week to hear Rusesabagina speak about his ordeal during the 100-day Rwandan genocide that claimed the lives of more than 800,000 people.

Among the many memories he shared, Rusesabagina recalled the day he, his family and hundreds more sought refuge from the daily massacres by staying at the Mille Collines Hotel in Kigali after most of the United Nations' 2,500 peacekeeping troops in the country had left.

"The international community... had decided to turn their backs and run away. Many people, who had trusted in the United Nations, the international community, had gathered in churches and schools."

He said people were begging the UN peacekeeping troops to take them with them, telling the troops they would be murdered if they were left behind.

For 76 days, Rusesabagina bribed and negotiated with Hutu generals and militants to keep them from murdering the refugees in the Belgian-owned hotel where he was assistant manager.

Paul Rusesabagina

Although Rusesabagina, a Hutu, was given the opportunity to flee the hotel to safety as part of a partial evacuation, he declined, opting to protect those who were forced to stay behind.

He recalled what happened when he heard the news that the 150 refugees at the church just 500 metres from the hotel were all slaughtered.

Rusesabagina said he knew the extremists were going to kill the people in the hotel next if he didn't do something.

With nothing to lose, he confronted Hutu Gen. Augustin Bizimungu as his men approached the hotel and told him to think about the way he wanted to be remembered in the history books.

As the men began charging the hotel, the general told them he would personally kill anyone who murdered a guest of the hotel.

"That day, the general saved our lives," said Rusesabagina, who also spoke last week under Hillel auspices at Concordia University in Montreal, in Vancouver at the University of British Columbia, and in Winnipeg at the University of Manitoba.

Although the Rwandan genocide ended more than 11 years ago, Rusesabagina urged the audience not to ignore the fact that bloodshed in Africa continues to this day.

"Even today people are butchering people [in Africa] and the world stands by, watches, and doesn't do anything," he said.

He noted that "1.8 million people are displaced in Northern Uganda and taken as hostages within their own country and no one talks about that.

"Just recently, I went to Darfur to see what was going on and what I saw in Darfur is exactly what I was seeing in Rwanda between 1990 and 1994. We saw two million people displaced within Darfur, in their own country."

He said entire villages have been destroyed, people are being murdered and wells are being intentionally poisoned to ensure that villagers won't have access to clean water.

"Have we learned from history?" he asked.

He recalled watching news reports of world leaders gathering last January at Auschwitz to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the death camp's liberation, with each speaker uttering the phrase, "Never again."

But the words are meaningless without action, he said.

"There are so many voices calling for help, calling for you. Please, do something."

In the article "Mae Waese fought for changes in education," (CJN, Jan. 12), a number of names were inadvertently cut off. Waese is survived by her husband, Lou; children Heather and Arnon Glatter, Bradley and Karen Waese, James Waese and Matt; five grandchildren; and sisters and brothers-in-law Marcia Lightman, Barbara and Gerry Raber and Ronnie and Sam Hoffer. She was pre-deceased by brother-in-law Sigmund Lightman. The CJN regrets the error.

'Extremist' minority behind boycott call: Saada

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Jacques Saada, the cabinet minister seeking re-election in a riding on Montreal's South Shore, is confident that a call from one of his constituents for Muslims not to vote for him because of his Zionism does not represent the views of that community.

Under the heading "Don't Vote [for] Jacques Saada," Ammar Khan on Jan. 5 posted on the website Montreal Muslim News the message: "Many Muslims in Montreal vote Liberal by default, which means that in Brossard-La Prairie, Muslims vote 'en masse' for Jacques Saada, a former Israeli soldier and Zionist zealot," providing a link to an article in The CJN.

Saada, who is Jewish, was first elected in Brossard-La Prairie in 1997, and is the minister of the Economic Development Agency of Canada for the regions of Quebec and minister responsible for the Francophonie.

In an interview with CJN, Saada said his relations with the Muslim community in his riding are very good and, in fact, three of its leaders are on his campaign team. "They are shocked by this," he said.

His rapport with Muslims has developed despite his having always been clear about his strong support for Israel, where he lived briefly, he said. "Zionism is part of who I am. I'm extremely proud of it. I've never hidden it."

He is also a supporter of an independent Palestinian state, alongside Israel.

"Of course, there are some people who are extremist and want to import problems to Canada rather than export Canadian values. Some people try to create division where there is none. But they are a very small minority," he said.

Saada said about 1,000 people came out when he accompanied Prime Minister Paul Martin on a campaign stop at a mosque under construction in Brossard at the end of December. Members of both the Muslim and the small Jewish community "stood side by side" at Saada's campaign launch. "This is a very special riding. Muslims and Jews work hand in hand here," he said.

Saada has not experienced the defacing of his campaign posters with swastikas and stars of David as he did in the 2004 and 2000 campaigns, he said.

According to Statistics Canada, 3,830 Muslims live in the riding, based on the 2001 census, representing 3.8 per cent of the population. Saada is in a tight race with the Bloc Québécois's Marcel Lussier. The riding has only 245 Jews, whose main organization has officially endorsed Saada.

Khan, in his Montreal Muslim News posting, writes that Saada received a "failing grade of F" in the Canadian Islamic Congress's grading of candidates across the country in this election, providing a link to that report. (The Kitchener, Ont.-based congress has given Saada's Bloc rival, Lussier, a top-rank "A.")

"All Muslims should try their best to be informed about who they are voting for," Khan concluded. At the end of last week, the posting was still on the website.

Khan declined to be interviewed by CJN, but in an e-mail exchange, he wrote: "I want to make it 100 per cent clear that I do not think that being critical of Zionism has anything to do with criticizing Judaism or the Jewish people. I find it highly offensive that the criticism of Zionism (a secular ideology) is often misrepresented as being anti-Semitic."

Khan referred to the vehement opposition to Zionism among the chassidic Satmar and Neturei Karta Jews as evidence that Zionism is incompatible with Judaism's primary religious texts. He points to articles on the Neturei Karta-associated website www.jewsnotzionists.org that "paint an image of Zionists as morally bankrupt fanatics and zealots" who cruelly oppress the Palestinians.

"Based on their well-argued criticism of Zionism, I would not vote for Jacques Saada who served in a Zionist organization and volunteered to serve in the Israeli army," which he adds is "an army of occupation and has been accused of numerous human rights violations."

Khan emphasized that he does not represent Montreal Muslim News in any capacity, but its editor, Yahya Adbul Rahman, echoed Khan's views in a letter to the pro-Israel website Judeoscope.

"The opposition to Jacques Saada has absolutely nothing to do with him being Jewish and [it] is rather devious and dishonest of you to imply that Muslims oppose him because he is Jewish. This is just the kind of rubbish that breeds further resentment because it is so absurd and yet defended by you so vigorously. In fact, he is being opposed for his politics and not his ethnicity. But, of course, you would be unable to make that distinction and use the anti-Semitic card instead."

Saada clarified for CJN that he served only in a civilian capacity.

Saada is a member of Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, which wants Canada to take a more pro-Israel stance. He was among the MPs opposing the granting of a broadcast license in Canada to the Arab television network Al-Jazeera because of its anti-Israel content.

This past year, he spearheaded an effort to have Israel and the Palestinian Authority admitted to the Francophonie, as means of promoting peace.

Salam Elmenyawi, president of the Muslim Council of Montreal, said Khan's views are not endorsed by his organization.

Elmenyawi said Muslims should not reject any candidate because he or she is a Zionist, but assess each according to the same criteria as anyone else. "This kind of generalization is unacceptable," he said.

He said Montreal Muslim News is editorially independent, but that he had spoken to Rahman about the importance of avoiding causing "dissension between the Muslim and Jewish community, or even the perception of it."

Nevertheless, the council gives the site the freedom to post opinions it does not necessarily endorse because it wants to allow open discussion.

Elmenyawi also met with Saada to reassure him. "He is a friend of the Muslim community and respected in the Jewish community, which puts him in a unique position to strengthen the bridges between us."

Hamilton agency helps fight poverty in the city

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the News

HAMILTON — More than one in five Jewish children in Hamilton live below the poverty line.

In fact, according to the 2001 national census, 795 of Hamilton's 4,675 Jews are poor. This represents 17 per cent of the city's Jews, while the national poverty average for Jews is about 13 per cent.

It's a crisis that not a lot of people are aware of, said Carol Krames, director of Jewish Social Services of Hamilton (JSSH), whose organization is charged with helping the 575 Jewish households that have been identified as poor by UJA Federation of Hamilton.

"There is no picture of what a poor person is. Some are the ones you sit next to in shul, but others can't even afford to be part of the community," she said.

Krames said JSSH is fortunate to have federation's support. Its 2006 campaign aims to raise $1.1 million, which is a 10 per cent increase over 2005's record-setting $1-million total.

As well as supporting JSSH, funds from the campaign go to Israel, as well as to Hamilton's Jewish Community Centre, the city's Jewish day schools, the Midrasha High School, the McMaster Jewish Students Association and the Hamilton Jewish News.

Started in 1932, JSSH is the oldest Jewish organization in Hamilton.

In the 1950s, it helped Jews settle in Hamilton after the Hungarian Revolution. In the 1970s, Jews from the Soviet Union needed help to settle in the community.

"Gradually, the need has changed," said Krames, who has been with the organization for 30 years.

These days, she said, much of the JSSH's assistance goes to single-parent families, seniors or people who have been laid off from work.

Krames also noted that many people move to Hamilton to find cheaper housing, but have trouble finding a job.

"They could be on disability pension or Ontario Works or have a drug problem. They could have a nice car and a huge mortgage, and then get laid off," she said.

"We also help clients from Toronto because [that city's Jewish Family & Child Service has] such a big caseload. There needs to be help outside the area, because Jewish people are Jewish people."

Krames also noted that when JSSH opened its kosher food bank 13 years ago, it was intended to be a temporary measure.

But since April 2004, the number of families it serves has jumped from 10 to 35.

"We may also help with a bat mitzvah, like sponsoring a modest kiddush, because that's an important part of being in the community, or we may pay for someone to go to a Chanukah party, so people go and feel good about themselves," Krames said.

As well, the organization offers counselling, home and hospital visits, English as a second language classes, and a choir and theatre club for adults.

"As a Jewish community, we have to think of what are the rights of the poor," Krames said.

"In the Torah, I know it says we are responsible to help a person to receive their needs. Sometimes it's impossible, but we try."

Ken Dryden

in York Centre

Since the last election there has been a lot of noise. But we were elected to govern.

Our biggest campaign promises had to do with health care, assistance for cities and early learning and child care.

The result:

- a 10-year agreement ($41.3 billion) with provinces to protect publicly funded health care (including reduction of wait times)
- historic agreements to make cities more livable (including $350m for TTC and $385m for GO Transit)
- as Minister of Social Development: 10 provinces, 10 agreements - towards creating a national system of early learning and child care.

All this while maintaining balanced budgets, reducing debt and lowering personal income taxes, and an economy that in terms of employment growth and rate of increase in living standards, is first in the G7.

Regarding Canada and Israel:

- as Minister, my first overseas trip was to Israel where I brought to life long-hoped for negotiations on pension payments for Canadians living in Israel and Israelis living in Canada
- as Minister, I concluded an agreement between Social Development Canada and Palestinian Ministry of Social Affairs to help them create the structure and governance needed to deliver social services more effectively
- as a Government, we made six important vote changes on UN Resolutions.

There is a lot more yet to do, and we would like to do it.
I am very proud to be your Member of Parliament.

Vegan cookies go kosher

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Have a new kind of kosher cookie. Try a crunchy, surprise-filled treat from Toronto's trendy New Moon Kitchen – cookies with names like Bite Me and Chocolate Mo'Mints. And as of a few days before Yom Kippur 2005, all of New Moon's products are kosher, certified by Kosher Supervision of America (KSA).

"[Going kosher] was easy because we're a vegan establishment," says New Moon president Eden Hertzog.

Most vegans avoid all animal products, including dairy, eggs, honey and yeast – all staples of mainstream bakeries. So Hertzog, 28, shares her motivation for starting New Moon eight years ago. "I like desserts. I wanted to create desserts that were really good."

New Moon's entire line is vegan and pareve, with no preservatives, dairy, wheat (organic spelt, a related grain, is used instead) or nuts. If cookies aren't your style, try a loaf – like Bunny, loaded with carrots, or Nana Bread, rich with sweet ripe bananas and Belgian chocolate chips, a top seller.

Inspired by her great-grandmother, Bubbie Goldie, who baked for her nine children daily and who, in her late 80s, still sold her renowned banana bread to Just Desserts, Hertzog began baking for a vegetarian restaurant part time during high school. Later, she branched out on her own, selling sweets for extra money.

She launched New Moon with friend and business partner, Shoshanna Gehring, who has since left the company. New Moon moved to its current Toronto location – a large loft near Ossington Avenue and Dupont Street– in 2000, and recently expanded into a second loft for extra space. Now, Hertzog, who had no formal business training, reels off the numbers: New Moon produces 2,500 loaves a month, 4,000 bags of cookies. But she's still guided by her personal ethic – it's never just about the numbers. "I like to grow, but… I have to be happy in my life while I do it."

She wants her workers – five full-time employees and a driver – to be happy as well. "It's a low-stress environment."

Becoming kosher was simple, Hertzog says, since she keeps the bakery "clean, efficient, sparkly." After an initial inspection, KSA informed Hertzog that she'd have to replace the baking pans and sheets. They also checked the sources of all ingredients to verify their kosher certification.

One ingredient, jaggery (also known as gur or panela), a natural cane sugar, needed extra research. Because this molasses-like sweetener is made in India, the rabbis had to investigate it before determining that it's a pure, raw sugar product, which is fine in a kosher facility.

Being unrefined, jaggery is rich in iron and other nutrients. That doesn't mean they can overdo it in the chocolate cake or Mokas cookies, made with fair-trade espresso, but the use of healthier ingredients reflects Hertzog's commitment to quality even as her business expands. "I want to keep the products as homemade as possible."

She and Gehring always envisioned someday becoming kosher. "It's dear to us because of our Jewish backgrounds," she says. New Moon also no longer bakes on Saturdays, who says it was the right thing to do.

Doing the right thing matters to Hertzog in other ways, too. She is a rising star in the Toronto food world who recently participated in Eat to the Beat, a breast cancer fundraiser, and who was scheduled to speak at the Women's Health Matters Forum last weekend. Her topic? "Everyone deserves cookies: cooking for special diets."

But there are more than spiritual advantages to kashrut for New Moon and others, like ShaSha Bread, a local sourdough bread bakery that also came under the KSA recently. "It opens up a lot in the United States," Hertzog says.

She also feels "the kosher market is growing pretty rapidly," as non-Jews look to kosher symbols as a guarantee of products free of specific dairy or meat ingredients.

Because New Moon is using up its old packaging, there is no symbol currently on products in stores. This will change as the packages are replaced by new labels featuring the KSA symbol. A list of stores carrying New Moon's products is available at http://www.newmoonkitchen.com.

Does Gender Define Soul?

She's back again speaking on a topic of great interest!

Hamas's rising popularity worries Fatah leaders

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
Jerusalem Post

RAMALLAH — Representatives of the ruling Fatah party on Sunday expressed concern about Hamas's rising popularity, accusing the Islamic movement of exploiting the plight of the Palestinians for political gain in upcoming Palestinian parliamentary elections.

"The situation doesn't look good for Fatah," a top Palestinian Authority official here told the Jerusalem Post. "If I were in [PA President Mahmoud Abbas's] place, I would find a way to postpone the election."

A public opinion poll published over the weekend by the Development Studies Program at Bir Zeit University indicated Hamas could win up to 30 per cent of the vote, as opposed to 35 per cent for Fatah.

Another poll, conducted by Al-Quds, the largest Palestinian newspaper, gave Hamas 24 per cent, while Fatah got only 21 per cent.

Ismail Haniyeh, head of Hamas's list for the Jan. 25 election, revealed on Sunday that a leading European country was holding contacts with his movement. He did not name the country, but said it was one of the founders of the European Union.

Haniyeh said the European country made it clear it would deal with Hamas if it formed the next PA cabinet. He said several other European countries had dispatched envoys to meet Hamas leaders in Gaza, but he refused to elaborate.

"Some Americans are also talking to Hamas," he added.

Said Siam, a Hamas political leader who is running in the election, said he is in charge of holding talks with diplomats based in Ramallah and Gaza City.

"We have contacts with foreign embassies," he said. "We also have contacts with international organizations such as the United Nations and the International Committee of the Red Cross."

Former PA minister Muhammad Dahlan, who is running as a Fatah candidate, launched a scathing attack on Hamas and accused it of making concessions on the issue of Jerusalem. He said Hamas was prepared to take part in the vote even if Israel barred Arab residents of Jerusalem from casting ballots.

"I was shocked by what I heard from Hamas over the past week," he told reporters. "How can a party give up its principles so easily and quickly?"

Dahlan, one of the most feared security commanders under former PA president Yasser Arafat, said Hamas would restrict freedom of speech if it took over the PA.

"The Palestinians can't rely on those who exploit religion for private and factional interests," he said.

Dahlan scoffed at Hamas's claim that it wouldn't negotiate with Israel in the future.

"I have statements from Hamas leaders suggesting that they are prepared to talk to Israel," he said.

Partial feasibility enough for Iran strike: study

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — A recent research project by the Israeli Air Force has determined that in the summer of 1981, Israel didn't have a clear picture of the impact a strike on Iraq's nuclear reactor would have, but it chose to attack anyway.

Then prime minister Menachem Begin ordered the bombing, condemned by the world at the time, thus inaugurating what became known as the "Begin Doctrine," Israel's policy of launching a pre-emptive strike to prevent any of its enemies acquiring nuclear weapons.

The Begin Doctrine has been repeatedly invoked lately regarding Iran and Israel's response to its suspected efforts to produce nuclear weapons.

The internal IAF research paper shows that the feasibility of a successful military operation need not be total in order for Israeli leaders to order such a strike. This appears to contradict a recent U.S. army report that claims Israel has no viable military option against Iranian nuclear weapons.

According to a senior Air Force officer who was privy to the IAF paper, the intelligence available at the time of the June 1981 strike on the Iraqi reactor at Osirak was only partial and it was unclear whether the planned air raid would be effective.

"At the time, there was no firm information on either the extent of the damage that the strike could cause or whether it would have a fatal impact on the Iraqi nuclear program. The information [Begin] had was very partial, even to the extent of the physical damage we could do to the target and how much it would delay the Iraqi program," the senior officer said.

But that was history and today it is Iran and its nuclear program that weighs heavily on the minds of Israeli officials.

The IAF officer said Iran is increasingly fearful of attack. "But they are limited in their ability to create an effective air defence," he said.

According to intelligence, Iran has beefed up its air defences around various nuclear sites as a precaution against a possible pre-emptive strike by U.S. or Israeli forces. The source described the present Iranian air defences as "good." It's known that Iran has deployed Soviet-origin anti-aircraft systems around the 1,000-megawatt Bushehr nuclear reactor.

Iran's air defence contains Russian SA-2, SA-5, SA-6 as well as shoulder-launched SA-7 missiles, according to the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies. Iran also has aged U.S.-made Hawk missiles and has been seeking to purchase the sophisticated S-300P from Russia.

One war-game scenario played out by the IAF was a U.S. attack on Iranian nuclear sites. In this case, it was believed the United States would give Israel a prior warning of "perhaps a day, nothing significant."

"There is no way the Iranians would believe that it was the Americans and [they] will seek to retaliate against Israel," a senior officer said.

The officer declined to say whether there were key targets in Iran that, if destroyed, would seriously set back Iran's nuclear program.

Israel threatened by Iran: Bush

Bush was careful not to specify what moves he expected the Security Council to take against Iran, leaving that decision to the members themselves. "I'm not going to prejudge what the United Nations Security Council should do," Bush said, "but I recognize that it's logical that a country which has rejected diplomatic entreaties be sent to the United Nations Security Council."

Over the past week, the U.S. has been conducting intense diplomatic negotiations with its European allies, mapping out the possible scenarios for a Security Council discussion on Iran. It is clear to the U.S. that the initial stage will include a call to resume inspections, but will probably fall short of mentioning sanctions. These may only be introduced in a second round, after Iran is given time to respond to the demands it was presented with.

Meanwhile, Ahmadinejad, on Saturday, shrugged off threats of UN sanctions from Washington and its European allies, saying he would not be bullied because there was no legal basis to forbid Tehran from conducting nuclear research.

In a ringing defence of Iran's resumption last week of research at its nuclear enrichment facility at Natanz, Ahmadinejad said Tehran had not violated the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty (NPT), which he said allowed signatories to produce nuclear fuel. The move drew fierce international condemnation and threats to seek UN sanctions.

"The time of using language of bullying and coercion… is over," Ahmadinejad told a packed news conference in the capital. "There is no evidence to prove Iran's diversion [toward nuclear weapons]."

What's more, Ahmadinejad said, Iran has no use for nuclear weapons. "You can use nuclear technology in several ways, and we want to do so peacefully," he said, claiming that such weaponry violated the tenets of Islam.

Iran insists its program is intended only for electricity generation; the U.S. and other countries fear the explanation is a cover for building a nuclear bomb.

The news conference marked the second day of a tough public relations offensive by Tehran. On Friday, Iran threatened to end surprise inspections by and co-operation with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the UN nuclear watchdog, if it is referred to the Security Council for possible imposition of sanctions.

Ashkenazi Jewish population has often been studied

Researchers from universities in Italy, Estonia, Portugal, France, the United States and Russia contributed to the latest study, which has been published online by the prestigious American Journal of Human Genetics and will appear in print in March.

The Technion team's discoveries have significant implications beyond their inherent interest and relevance to human history; they are vital to understanding the mechanisms of genetic health and disease in human populations.

The researchers' conclusions are based on detailed comparative analysis of DNA sequence variation in the mitochondrial DNA (mtDNA) region of the human genome. This type of DNA is transmitted to descendants solely by the mother.

The researchers found that the mtDNA of some 3.5 million of the eight million Ashkenazi Jews currently living throughout the world can be traced back to only four women carrying distinct mtDNA of a type virtually absent in other populations. Non-Ashkenazi Jews also carry low frequencies of these distinct mtDNA types, thus providing evidence of shared maternal ancestry of Ashkenazi and non-Ashkenazi Jews.

This is consistent with previous findings based on studies of the Y-chromosome, pointing to a similar pattern of shared paternal ancestry of global Jewish populations, originating in the Middle East.

The researchers concluded that the four founding mtDNA – likely of Middle Eastern origin – underwent a major overall expansion in Europe during the last millennium.

The Ashkenazi Jewish population has often been studied by experts in human genetics because of the accumulation of some 20 recessive hereditary disorders that are concentrated in this population, the study's authors wrote.

The worldwide Human Genome Project for mapping human DNA sequence variation has not only made it possible to predict certain genetic diseases, but also to identify family and genealogical relationships (shared ancestries) among individuals.

New foreign minister

Justice Minister Tzipi Livni was to assume her duties as foreign minister on Sunday, following the resignation of all Likud ministers from cabinet. Livni becomes the first woman in Israel to hold the post since Golda Meir. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who holds 15 portfolios as a result of the Likud resignations, is set to appoint six Kadima ministers to fill the vacancies, but said he would remain finance minister. Likud ministers Silvan Shalom, Limor Livnat, Yisrael Katz and Dan Naveh reluctantly followed an order from Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu to resign.

Israeli Arab arrested as spy

An Israeli Arab was charged with spying for Iran. Jaris Jaris was indicted by Haifa District Court for contact with foreign agents and conspiring to give information to the enemy. He was arrested Dec. 12. In a related story, Iran said it had arrested an Israeli agent in Tehran. Israeli officials did not respond to that report.

Israel shuns Robertson

Israel said U.S. evangelical leader Pat Robertson would not be allowed to take part in a planned $48 million (US) Christian Heritage Center on the shore of the Sea of Galilee. A spokesperson for Tourism Minister Abraham Hirchson said Israel would include other Christian groups in the 125-acre project, which is to be complete by the end of the decade. Robertson recently suggested that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Jan. 4 stroke was divine punishment for last summer's Gaza pullout. Last week, he apologized, calling his remarks "insensitive."

'Passover massacre' mastermind sentenced

The mastermind of the 2002 "Passover massacre" has received 35 life sentences. Abbas Al-Sayed received the jail time for his role in the bombing of Netanya's Park Hotel in March 2002, which killed 30 people. Sayed, a Hamas chief in the West Bank city of Tulkarm, was also found guilty of planning an attack in Netanya in 2001 that killed five people.

Israeli wins speaking contest

An Israeli won an international speech award. Haifa University philosophy student Anat Gilboa took first place at this month's world rhetorical championships in Dublin. Gilboa, 25, has said she had to overcome intense stage fright to become an accomplished public speaker. The competition was conducted in English. Among Gilboa's assigned subjects were Pakistan, animal rights and nuclear energy.

Olive tree vandals sought

The army plans to begin setting ambushes in West Bank olive groves to try to nab the people behind the uprooting of thousands of Palestinian olive trees. The defence establishment's main concern, one security official said, was that people sneaking into olive groves could run into Palestinian harvesters and gun battles could ensue.

Senator attends conference for Jewish parliamentarians

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Canadian Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein was among more than 60 Jewish legislators from 28 countries who gathered in Jerusalem last week for the International Council of Jewish Parliamentarians (ICJP).

The only Canadian in attendance due to the upcoming federal election, Grafstein, who was nominated by his peers to be first vice-president of the ICJP Assembly Council, said the Jan. 8-10 conference at the David Citadel Hotel was one of the most useful he's ever attended.

"We have had three excellent days of discussions," said Grafstein, who belongs to inter-parliamentary associations in Europe, Asia and Latin America, and has a reputation for raising awareness about anti-Semitism and the Holocaust. "It was an invaluable experience to connect with Jewish parliamentarians from around the globe."

Jerry Grafstein

That was the primary objective of the conference, which brought together representatives from countries such as Hungary, Ukraine, Costa Rica, South Africa, France, Argentina, the United States and the Dominican Republic.

"Through this unique platform of extensive networking, Jewish leaders from around the world can help further humanitarian and Jewish causes in a most influential and effective way," said Bobby Brown, director of international affairs and the Israel office of the World Jewish Congress (WJC), which organized the event along with the Knesset, the Israeli ministries of foreign affairs and tourism, and the Israel Forum.

"The overwhelming feeling we got from attendees is that there is a lot of benefit to be derived from being in contact with one another. It was almost like we put water before a bunch of thirsty people!"

This contact is especially important in cases where there is only one Jewish member of the national parliament in a country's government, since whether he has the knowledge or not, he or she will be called on to speak on behalf of the Jewish community, Brown said.

This is one example of how the ICJP – which gives parliamentarians the opportunity to pool their collective experience to come up with policy ideas – can be a critical resource.

The group was founded in 2002 to link Jewish lawmakers from around the world with Israel and the Diaspora on matters of human rights, anti-Semitism, restitution of Holocaust-era assets, relations with the developing world, interfaith dialogue and international ethical issues.

"It's sort of modelled after black or Hispanic caucuses," Brown said.

But he added that the ICJP's mandate is not exclusively Jewish.

"Jewish issues don't function in isolation," he said, offering the example of anti-Semitism, which is part of the problem of xenophobia and racism.

"The problems facing the Jewish world are the same ones facing humanity as a whole. Since the problems of the Jewish people are global in nature, there is a big benefit in working together on a global solution."

Grafstein concurred. "Our common interest is to promote democracy and the rule of law," he said. "And when you are promoting democracy, you are promoting Israel. There is no inconsistency there."

In addition to hearing from Dr. Shlomo Mor-Yosef, director general of the Hadassah Medical Organization, on the health of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon (who was originally scheduled to address the conference), attendees heard from Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, President Moshe Katsav, Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, and Zeev Bielski, chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, on issues facing Israel and the Jewish world.

The parliamentarians also met for sessions on electronic anti-Semitism, interfaith relations, and Jewish contributions to relief and tikkun olam efforts.

Grafstein chaired the session on electronic anti-Semitism and noted that there are currently 4,000 to 5,000 anti-Semitic websites on the Internet, the majority of which emanate from North America.

"Quite a number of these were generated in Canada," he said, adding that governments worldwide should be urged to monitor the electronic dissemination of anti-Semitic material.

"Who is going to deal with this on a worldwide basis? Anti-Semitism is expanding, and our counter-measures need to be as organized, rigorous and as global as those who create the propaganda."

On the interfaith dialogue front, Grafstein co-founded the International Council of Political Coexistence, to be headquartered in the United Kingdom, which aims to foster communication between Jewish and Muslim parliamentarians in participating countries' governments.

Grafstein also invited the mayor of Manchester, Mohammed Afzal Khan, to visit Canada.

"[Khan] has made a big contribution to interfaith dialogue," said Grafstein, who added that while Canada's interfaith talks are an example to other countries, Canada falls short when it comes to actual interfaith exchanges.

He said he hopes Canada can "learn some successful techniques" from the Pakistani-born Khan, who was a founding member in 2004 of Manchester's Muslim-Jewish Forum.

Grafstein, who is involved in trade issues between Israel and Canada, and in facilitating free trade between North America, Europe, Israel and Arab states, said the session on tikkun olam – which addressed challenges that Israel faces when it tries to give aid to foreign countries that refuse to co-operate with the Jewish state– was of particular interest.

"Most people don't realize that per capita, Israel helped tsunami victims more than anyone else in the world," he said.

But Grafstein said networking outside the sessions gave him the most gratification, which is why he helped create a website for participants to continue to share experiences and best practices after the conference.

"My approach to life is very simple. I think the glass is half full," he said. "But let's fill up the rest of the glass!"

History Television premieres six-part series on Auschwitz

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Jan. 27 is the first International Day of Commemoration to Honour Holocaust Victims, and to mark the event, History Television is premiering the BBC series Auschwitz: The Nazis & The Final Solution.

The six-part series traces the history of Auschwitz from its beginnings as a camp for Polish political prisoners to its liberation by the forces of the Soviet Union. Russian prisoners were early victims of brutal Nazi extermination experiments in the camp, where more than one million people were killed.

Auschwitz is unique among the many documentaries on this death camp, situated in southwest Poland. Rather than relying on old black and white footage and voiceovers, writer Laurence Rees dramatizes many key events.

In the first two episodes, for instance, we see dramatizations of the infamous Wannsee Conference – when senior Nazis mapped out their plan to kill Europe's Jews – and SS head Heinrich Himmler's visit to the USSR in 1941 to witness the execution of Jewish civilians. It was during this trip that Himmler realized firing squads were inefficient for the mass genocide he had in mind, and that he had to find a "better way of killing."

This series is also unique in that it draws upon recently released archival documents from eastern Europe, such as Himmler's journal – which was captured by the Soviets – and rare footage of a Nazi-sponsored pogrom in occupied Ukraine.

More than 100 people were interviewed for the series, including survivors and their oppressors. One former SS guard tells his interviewer he has no feelings at all when he recalls his role in the firing squads in 1941.

Another man, a former member of the Hlinka (the Slovakian version of the SS) laughs when he talks about looting clothes from the Jews selected for deportation from Bratislava. "We, the guards, were doing quite well!" he said.

History Television airs two episodes back to back nightly from Jan. 25 to 27, beginning at 8 p.m.

Auschwitz: The Nazis & The Final Solution uses both dramatization, such as this scene of Heinrich Himmler discussing plans for Auschwitz with the camp's commandant Rudolf Hoess, top, as well as black and white archival footage.

YOUNG PRODUCER PRESENTS THIRD THEATRICAL PREMIERE

Mitchell Marcus, the 23-year-old producer and founder of Acting Up Stage, which has presented two fresh productions in as many years, continues the momentum with a local production of john & jen, the hit off-Broadway musical about the family ties that bind, sometimes too tightly.

Mitchell Marcus

A graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Marcus says he was won over by john & jen, which he describes as "a gem of a musical brimming with intelligence, wit and beautiful melodies." The music is by New York-based award-winning composer Andrew Lippa, who is a cantor for the High Holy Days at Congregation Beth Tikvah in Richmond, B.C. The lyricist is Tom Greenwald, who collaborated with Lippa on the theatrical book.

At the Walmer Centre Theatre, 188 Lowther Rd. at Walmer. $30-$27; limited rush seats available. Jan 26 to Feb. 11. 416-927-7880, www.johnandjen.ca

Neil Simon's Best: Encore Entertainment presents Lost in Yonkers, the Pulitzer prize-winning comedy by Neil Simon that producer Merle Garbe calls "a simple, truthful story about relationships [and] about the skeletons in the closet that all families have."

The comedy, which also won four Tony awards, centres on two young brothers who go to live with their steel-hearted grandmother in Yonkers after their mother's death in 1942. The brothers are played by 15-year-old David Melamed and 12-year-old Michael Rausch. The grandmother is portrayed by Encore stalwart Marion Hirschberg.

At the Toronto Centre for the Arts (Studio Theatre), 5040 Yonge St. $26.50-$25. Feb. 2 to 12. 416-733-0558.

Names in the News: The Winterfolk Blues & Roots Festival (www.winterfolk.com) has released its roster of about 80 performers who will perform at five area venues in the Broadview-Danforth neighbourhood next month. The list includes the Sisters of Sheynville; the high-energy sextet of Yiddish swing and klezmer, as well as Brian Gladstone, festival organizer, guitarist-composer and this columnist's brother. The fourth annual fest takes place Feb. 3 through 5.

• Toronto yiddishist Michael Wex, together with his new book, Born to Kvetch: Yiddish Language and Culture in All of Its Moods, was the subject of the erudite and popular "On Language" column by Philologis in a recent issue of the New York-based Forward. In a column titled "Et tu, Wex?" Phil waxed eloquent on Wex and praised his book (published by St. Martin's Press) as the best of its genre, but still lamented – kvetched, really – that Wex fell into the odious trap of characterizing Yiddish as "an intrinsically cute or hilarious language" and presenting a "caricatured picture" of Jewish life in eastern Europe and America. "A Jewish joke is a Jewish joke, but do we really have to turn an entire civilization into one?" Phil cavilled, calling Wex's tome "in some ways the best and in others the most aggravating of them all."

Life and art of Sarah Bernhardt on view at New York museum

Currently on view at the Jewish Museum of New York is "Sarah Bernhardt: The Art of High Drama," focusing on the legendary French actress (1844-1923) who styled herself as "the Divine Sarah" and was the Madonna or Elizabeth Taylor of her day.

The great tragedienne was as canny as Madonna in her use of the media. She pioneered the use of photography to disseminate her image, was the first major actress to perform in films, and visited the studio of inventor Thomas Edison in Menlo Park, N.J., so she could record her famous "golden voice" for all time.

During her 60-year career, she premiered many theatrical roles that flowed from the pens of Victor Hugo, Edmond Rostand, Alexandre Dumas and other renowned playwrights. Unafraid of crossing boundaries, she exhibited paintings from her own brush and played an exemplary Hamlet late in her career. Fascinating to her contemporaries, this extremely thin, frizzy-haired belle juive sat for many fashionable artists, attached her name to products ranging from hair curlers to liqueurs, and was perhaps the most photographed woman in the world.

Sarah Bernhardt

An embodiment of the Belle Époque, Bernhardt's life and art are illuminated in this first major museum exhibition through more than 250 spectacular and rarely seen objects, including personal effects, jewelry, furniture, letters, painting, sculpture, films, costumes, posters and stage designs. Vintage photographs show her in such famous roles as Hamlet, Camille, Cleopatra and Joan of Arc.

The daughter and niece of Jewish courtesans, Bernhardt was baptized a Catholic but was mercilessly attacked by the popular press for her supposedly Jewish features and affinities. She was a staunch defender of Alfred Dreyfus and wrote a letter (on view in the exhibition) in support of Emile Zola's publication of J'Accuse. At the same time, she was a revered national figure, patriotically serving France during the Franco-Prussian War and World War I.

Interestingly, one of Bernhardt's most influential role models was another Jewish actress – the legendary Rachel, who was famous enough to have been known only by her first name, and whose sun was setting just as Bernhardt's was beginning to rise.

"Sarah Bernhardt: The Art of High Drama" continues at the New York Museum, 1109 Fifth Ave., until April 2.

Israel Mission: Rabbi Joseph Kelman, emeritus of Beth Emeth Synagogue of Toronto, is teaming with Rev. Dean Bye, of Return Ministry near London, Ont., to offer a third Jewish-Christian mission to Israel, with an optional pre-tour in Prague. The Prague component departs Toronto on April 24, the Israel-only component on April 27, and the group is scheduled to return from Israel on May 8.

B'nai Brith Canada invited Kelman on the first joint trip. "I could not imagine that it would be as exciting and meaningful as the last two trips have been," he said.

Since then, he has spoken several times to the strongly Zionist Christian group, which is headquartered in the small town of Centralia. ("Notice the last part of this name is aliyah," he observed.) A group of more than 60 people from Return Ministry also visited him at Beth Emeth last year to learn about Torah and how Jewish services are conducted.

For details on the mission, contact Ari Bauer at Peerless Travel, 7117 Bathurst St., Suite 200, Thornhill. 905-886-5610, ext. 415.

KlezFactor takes klezmer music in a new direction

By KYLE GORDON
CJN Intern

KlezFactor is on the verge of making an impact on the Toronto music scene with the recent release of their much-anticipated debut album, The Golem of Bathurst Manor.

"The CD is an amalgamation of pretty much everything I have learned in music, composition, arranging and playing," said bandleader Mike Anklewicz.

Anklewicz, who plays saxophone and clarinet, put together the six-member band in November 2004, with the intention of taking klezmer music in a new direction. "I wanted to create a different sound, music with a twist," he said.

The Golem of Bathurst Manor is a blend of klezmer, contemporary jazz and rock 'n' roll. It features six original compositions by Anklewicz and four interpretations of traditional klezmer songs.

"When you try and do something a little bit different, you have an uneasy feeling about whether or not people will get it," said Anklewicz. "I hope they do."

During the 15th century, Jewish musicians, know as klezmorim, established the tradition of klezmer music by trading songs with local travelling musicians. It quickly became a hybrid form of music, with influences from Russia, Ukraine, Hungary and Turkey. Klezmer was originally played at weddings and other simchahs.

KlezFactor's album features the well-known Fun Tashlich. In KlezFactor's interpretation, the traditional tune is transformed into a rock song with a driving beat and a guitar solo.

Anklewicz's favourite song on the CD is the title track, The Golem of Bathurst Manor. "It's the most interesting track off the album because it rewards multiple listening," said Anklewicz. It also highlights the band's improvisational skills and their high level of musicianship.

Ali Berkok on piano and melodica, Gregg Brennan on drums and percussion, Jennifer Burford on violin, Steve Gotlib on bass and Mark Pellizzer on guitar, with Anklewicz, create the unique sound of KlezFactor.

"Everybody in the band is awesome. The group dynamic is a really big part of the album. It's a special feeling when you go into the studio and things happen that you never expected," said Anklewicz.

For Berkok, creating the album has been an exciting experience. "I'm very happy and very proud of what I've been able to be a part of. This is my first album," he said.

Berkok credits the success of the band to the leadership of Anklewicz and the strong musical background of all the band members. "We all come from a jazz background, so we have a lot of listening skills. We bring a lot to the table as improvisers, which makes it easier to perform klezmer music," said Berkok.

The band has performed at the Renaissance Café, the Free Times Café: Bella, did ya eat? Brunch, and the Markham Theatre, to a sold-out audience of more than 500 people.

KlezFactor plays at the Tranzac Club on Jan. 19, the Horseshoe Tavern on Feb. 13 and returns to the Free Times Café: Bella, Did ya eat? Brunch on March 5.

Looking for Comedy in the Muslim World falls flat

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For the past few years, the United States has been trying hard to improve its image in Muslim countries. Keenly aware of the problem, film director and actor Albert Brooks uses this intriguing theme to flesh out his newest movie, Looking for Comedy in the Muslim World, which opens in local theatres on Jan. 20.

Brooks impersonates himself in this 98-minute film. In the opening scene, he portrays a middle-aged Hollywood actor down on his luck at a meeting with three studio executives in search of "the next Jimmy Stewart." The encounter is embarrassingly brief, since he obviously is not suitable for the role.

Albert Brooks, centre, in a scene from his latest movie, opening on Jan. 20.

As he bewails his fate, the postman rings once and delivers a registered letter from the U.S. State Department summoning him to Washington, D.C. Fred Dalton Thompson, the actor/politician playing himself as well, hands him a special assignment. He is to spend a month in India and Pakistan, with a combined Muslim population of 300 million, posing one question – "What makes you laugh?" – and writing a 500-page report upon his return to Los Angeles.

Thompson suggests that the answer to that burning question may break down cultural barriers and improve the United States' standing among Muslims. "There are huge numbers of people we don't understand," he says in a reference to Muslims, be they Indians or Pakistanis.

The prospect of producing a book-length report fazes Brooks, but he accepts the offer after being told he will receive a Medal of Freedom for his exertions. Accompanied to India by two State Department assistants, Stuart (John Carrol Lynch) and Mark (Jon Tenney), Brooks sets up shop in New Delhi. He then interviews a succession of Indians vying for a position as his interpreter.

One of the candidates, a Muslim woman encased in a black cloak from head to toe, asks: "You are not a Jew, are you?" Her question intimidates and flusters Brooks. "Not at this moment… Sometimes I am," he sputters lamely. Judging by her comment, Brooks has his work cut out in India.

He gives the job to Maya (Sheetal Sheth), a comely young Hindu woman free of racist attitudes and eager to please. She and Brooks sally into the colourful and congested streets of New Delhi, asking people what tickles their funny bone.

Short of useful answers, and dejected to learn that New Delhi has no comedy clubs, Brooks rents a hall and invites locals to what he bills as New Delhi's first comedy concert. His jokes fall flat. A sample: "Why is there no Halloween in India? Because they took away the Gandhi."

Unable to obtain a Pakistani visa, Brooks sneaks into Pakistan and entertains a group of aspiring Pakistani comedians sitting around a campfire. They warm to his jokes, but they are pathetic.

Continuing his quest, Brooks meets with an Al Jazeera executive who surprisingly offers him a part in a forthcoming sitcom to be called That Darn Jew. When Brooks rejects the overture, the executive asks, "Do you know how to get hold of Jerry Seinfeld?" As Brooks leaves his office, the executive shouts, "Get me another Jew!"

This is not amusing. Nor is the rest of this ill-conceived, misbegotten film. More important, the premise of Looking for Comedy in the Muslim World, written and directed by Brooks, is silly, even as an artistic conceit. And the jokes, except for a Polish joke early on, are terrible.

As the film ends, Brooks' wife (Emma Lockhart) showers him with compliments on a supposedly successful mission and calls him "the Henry Kissinger of comedy." This is a gross misrepresentation. Brooks' talents in this picture desert him and leave him open to ridicule. Viewers, however, will not be disappointed by the shots of New Delhi's tourist sights. In contrast to the film itself, they are interesting.

Please note: submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2006 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 24, 2006. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 2006.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 2006. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Koltai proves his mettle as a director with Fateless

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Lajos Koltai, the renowned Hungarian cinematographer, read Fateless, Imre Kertesz's magisterial novel about the Holocaust, he was positively hooked.

"I thought I could photograph it," he said in a recent interview. "I could visualize it."

But after speaking with Kertesz, the 2002 Nobel Prize laureate in literature, Koltai suddenly found himself in unfamiliar territory.

Kertesz wanted him to direct Fateless, which was screened at last year's Toronto International Film Festival and is due to open in local theatres on Friday, Jan. 27.

Kertesz, whose novel was published some 30 years ago in complete obscurity, chose Koltai as director because their respective visions of the film meshed.

They agreed that the linear structure of the novel should be left intact and that the character of the protagonist, a boy of 14, should be revealed through his soul.

Koltai, who has collaborated with famed Hungarian director Istvan Szabo on 14 films, including Mephisto, Colonel Redl and Sunshine, began preparing for Fateless in 2000.

"We had sympathy, but no money," explained Koltai, a 59-year-old man with a thick mane of silver hair who, in his interview with The CJN, was clad in black from head to toe and wearing rimless glasses that reflected the light.

But after Kertesz won the Nobel Prize for his body of work, the Hungarian government pitched in and contributed half the budget of 11 million Euros (about $15.5 million Cdn), while Hungarian-born Canadian producer Andras Hamori came on board. (The film could have been made without the participation of the government, Koltai noted.)

Koltai never had any doubts about his ability to direct his first film. On previous film sets, he had not only been a cinematographer, but a collaborator as well, he explained.

"I wasn't just a technical person. I was always involved in the totality of the film. So it was not much of a big departure for me to be a director."

He never considered the possibility of acting as his own cinematographer. "It would have been impossible to be both. Anyway, I found a young, very talented Hungarian cinematographer, Gyula Pados."

Kertesz, who also wrote the screenplay, was not bothered by the fact that Koltai is not Jewish.

"He thought that was good. A certain emotional distance was needed. We didn't want sentimentality," Koltai said.

In his quest to find an actor to play the lead role, Koltai auditioned 1,000 boys and studied 3,000 photographs. He settled on Marcell Nagy, who carries the film, because he projects innocence and wisdom. "He has a clear, beautiful face."

Koltai could have filmed on location in Buchenwald and Auschwitz-Birkenau, but instead had sets built to stand in for these concentration camps. He felt the sites would have been desecrated had he shot there.

Fateless was "a huge success" in Hungary, he said. "It beat U.S. commercial films at the box office. The young generation ran to see it."

Asked to explain the film's popularity, Koltai replied, "Because of the boy, the beautiful, loveable boy."

To Koltai's relief, Kertesz liked it too. "He is unbelievably happy with it. He said, 'It's absolutely right and precise.'"

No one but Kertesz could have written the script, he said. "The book is so complex. He knows what's really important."

In Koltai's mind, the message in Fateless is unambiguously clear.

"Life is very unpredictable. You never know how it will turn out. You should be prepared for anything. The world is a terrible place."

Hungarians are just now coming to terms with Hungary's complicity in the Holocaust, he said. "We know that a Hungarian administration made it happen."

Yet many Hungarians are loath to discuss the Holocaust, which Koltai, the son of a leather worker, called "a trauma for European culture."

He noted that some Hungarians, possibly out of anti-Semitic motives, simply refuse to acknowledge the Holocaust. "My neighbour in Budapest thinks it's a legend!"

Medicine must treat body, mind, soul, says physician

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

The newest weapon in medicine's arsenal against Alzheimer's and other diseases could be a surprising one – a siddur.

Preliminary studies done by Dr. Yakir Kaufman, director of neurology services at Israel's Sarah Herzog Memorial Hospital, have shown that spirituality can slow the progression of dementia symptoms in patients with Alzheimer's.

He likes to challenge his audiences, most often other physicians, by asking them to define health. Usually, he hears that it's the absence of disease. "This," he says, "is like a shoemaker who doesn't know what a good shoe is."

He then introduces the World Health Organization's definition: health is "a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being," Kaufman told an audience at Shaarei Tefilah Synagogue last month, at an event co-sponsored by Torah in Motion, the Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital and the Jewish Health Alliance

In his talk titled "The science linking body, mind and soul," Kaufman said he believes today's western medical system is failing because it does not provide health care in the truest sense – care of an individual's social, psychological and spiritual well-being, rather than just his or her physical symptoms.

"In China, doctors would only get paid when everyone in their village was healthy," he said. Here, patients go to a doctor with symptoms, expecting the doctor to dispense a pill or offer surgery. "The relationship is not creative. I don't think that enhances health in a true way."

He pointed out that the best orthopedic hospitals in the world are at the bottom of ski slopes in Switzerland. "It's like we're waiting for people to be sick. If people were healthy, we'd be out of business."

In Kaufman's field of psychoneuroimmunology, practitioners take a more multidimensional view. "Multiple factors cause diseases, not only pharmacological," he said. "As a doctor, I'd like to know his social background, strengths, stressors, so I can really treat him."

His first encounter with a patient generally takes more than an hour. This establishes a good relationship, which Kaufman said is a "springboard" for a positive effect on the health of the patient.

Established in 1895, Herzog Hospital was Israel's first psychiatric hospital and currently specializes in geriatrics and psychiatry. Today, it is continuing to be innovative with a planned integrative health centre, which will incorporate what Kaufman believes is "the best of traditional and complementary medicine."

Kaufman described the body's physiological reactions to stress and the negative repercussions they can have. Some, including hypertension and heart disease, are well-known. Others are less commonly linked to stress, including cancer, dementia and infertility.

Many couples who adopt a baby quickly become fertile, Kaufman pointed out. Why? Once the pressure is off to try to conceive, levels of anxiety and stress go down. Treating stress should be any doctor's first approach to infertility, especially given that hormone therapy is not only costly but can have potentially devastating, even fatal, side effects. "We're not using the knowledge that we have to treat the source of the problem itself."

Using his evidence and that of others, Kaufman showed that spirituality and religion can create a strengthening effect that is exactly the opposite of the wear and tear of stress. Several factors may contribute to this, he explained, including healthier behaviours like less excessive drinking, social support systems and an upsurge in positive emotions such as a sense of hope and optimism.

Much of Kaufman's Alzheimer's research took place at Toronto's Baycrest Centre, and relied on participants' description of their spirituality or religiosity, terms Kaufman emphasized are not always interchangeable.

Participants, all diagnosed with probable Alzheimer's, rated themselves on criteria such as regular prayer and a sense of divine presence. Those who rated highest in these areas generally demonstrated the slowest rate of decline.

Kaufman, who recently presented his findings to the American Academy of Neurology, is currently seeking funding for more in-depth research on the connection between religion and Alzheimer's.

He hopes this will ultimately help underscore a view that the Torah has taught for thousands of years, that body and soul are inextricably entwined. The 18th-century Maggid of Mezritch said, "A small hole in the body comes from a large hole in the soul."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. We just found out that my elderly father has diabetes. Which sugar substitute can he safely use?

A. Splenda or Sucralose is your best bet. It tastes most like sugar and you can heat it in cooking or baking. You also can use it in the same quantity as you would sugar.

Q. My son is away at university and when he was home over the holidays, he said that he and his roommates rarely eat fruits and vegetables because, while they do cook, they only grocery shop about once a month. How can he get vitamins in a more convenient way?

A. Probably the best way for him to do this, since they do cook, is from canned and frozen fruits and vegetables. The students can buy frozen entrees that have vegetables, stir-fry kits and bagged frozen fruit and vegetables. The fruit is great in smoothies. Canned fruit and vegetables are also full of vitamins and easy to serve, and there is no reason to avoid them, especially in winter, when they can be a healthy, convenient and affordable alternative to fresh produce.

Q. Like many others, my New Year's resolution is to lose weight. I already eat quite healthy but I want to lose about five pounds. Any tips?

A. Start by keeping a food log of what you eat for a week, and then review it. When they write it down, many people are surprised to find what they actually eat. Look for foods that occur often throughout the week like alcohol, fruit juice, desserts, cheese, crackers, cookies and snack foods. Also, be accurate about portions. Are they larger than necessary? Next ask yourself before you eat if you are really hungry or if you are eating out of boredom, habit or depression.

Once you have taken an honest look, you can probably find some places to improve. The best place to start may be by simply cutting down on your portions and adding more vegetables for satiety and get moving, be as active as possible. It is great to do a 30-minute cardio workout a few days a week, but if you only have 10 minutes, you can still be active, walk up and down the stairs, put on music and dance around your house, or walk around the block. Good luck!

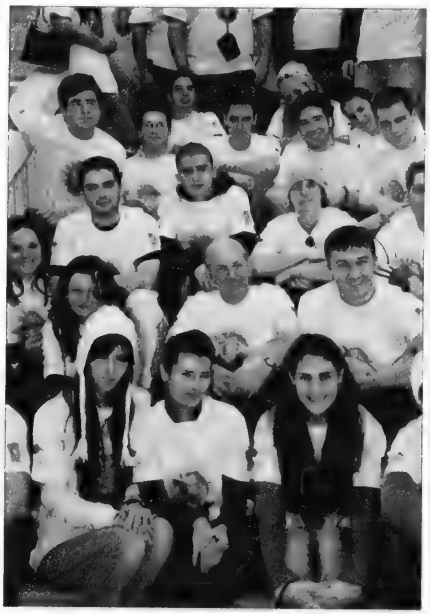
Freda Levine's 102nd birthday celebrated in Montreal, Jerusalem

When Freda Levine turned 102 in Montreal on Jan. 4, her nephew Charles Bronfman celebrated in Jerusalem, together with a group of Montreal young people who had arrived in Israel just hours earlier on a Taglit birthright israel trip.



Birthrighters from Montreal celebrate Aunt Freda's birthday in Jerusalem with Charles Bronfman, seated centre.

"Aunt Freda made a gift of a significant amount of money to Taglit-birthright israel because she's so in love with the program," Bronfman told his guests, who were gathered in the reception area of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies office in downtown Jerusalem.

The 35 Montrealers were among the 600 Canadians who are participating in birthright this winter. To date, over 10,000 Canadians and more than 80,000 youngsters from all over the world have gone to Israel on the program.

They wore T-shirts with "Happy 102nd Birthday Aunt Freda," and a photo of the lady was on the birthday cake. Bronfman was presented with a birthday card for his aunt that each participant had signed.

Bronfman thanked the Montrealers for participating in the celebration and for coming to Israel. "You are the guys who make this all happen," he said.

The Montrealers sang Happy Birthday in English, Hebrew and French. Bronfman told the group that his son Stephen and his wife Claudine, who live in Montreal, would be visiting Levine that evening, and would be showing her a photograph of the Jerusalem festivities sent via e-mail.

Levine's birthday party in Montreal was attended by close family members and friends, including 99-year old Syd Housner and 100-year-old Elsie Flanders.

Levine is Bronfman's late mother Saidye's youngest sister, the fourth daughter of Samuel and Priscilla Rosner, all of whom were born in Plum Coulee, Man. The family later moved to Winnipeg.

Freda was the only one who would graduate from university, the University of Manitoba. She married a doctor in Manitoba with whom she had two children.

"After Freda's first husband died, she moved to Montreal to be closer to her sister and brother-in-law, Saidye and Samuel Bronfman," Charles Bronfman said. "Soon afterward, she met and married her second husband, Moe Levine, a widower with two children.

A photo of Montrealer Freda Levine adorns a cake for her 102nd birthday, celebrated in Jerusalem by her nephew Charles Bronfman, along with Montreal participants on a birthright israel trip.

"Freda still lives in the same apartment today she has lived in for the past 30-odd years."

Bronfman co-founded the birthright israel educational program in 1999 together with American philanthropist Michael Steinhart, in conjunction with world Jewish communities and the government of Israel. Designed to strengthen Jewish identity among young Diaspora Jews, the program offers 18- to 26-year-olds their first Israel experience – 10 days in the country for free.

Non-Jewish Pole creates websites about Jewish history

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Tomasz Wisniewski, a historian, journalist and freelance writer who lives in Bialystok, Poland, has been interested in Poland's Jewish history for many years.

Although Wisniewski is not Jewish, he has been working on the reconstruction of Polish Jewish history along with the history of other national groups that existed in Poland for centuries. He has spent years researching the Jews of the Bialystok region, along with the Jews of numerous other places in Poland.

He has created several websites about Poland's Jews and written several books, including Jewish Bialystok and Surroundings and Synagogues and Jewish Communities in the Bialystok Region.

Wisniewski became an expert on the Jewish landmarks of Bialystok during his imprisonment in Poland, where he was jailed for dissident activities under the Communist regime in the 1980s.

"I became interested in Jewish history in prison because they [the prison] had a very good library, and once I read a book about the uprising in Bialystok ghetto, it was beginning of my interest. After I left jail, I went to the local library to find more books [and] information," he said in an interview conducted by e-mail.

Wisniewski's websites reflect the information he got from extensive research of Jewish life in Poland. Some of the information he got was from Jewish cemeteries, old synagogues and ritual baths. He said he "probably has the largest collection of original photographs of Jewish life in Poland taken pre-1945."

On one of his websites, it is noted that before World War II, the city of Bialystok was the heart of European Jewry, with approximately 50,000 Jews. "Today, only a dozen Jews live there."

He told The CJN that "Jewish Poland is a part of Polish history and there is no history of Poland without the history of the Jewish people.

"I am a Pole and Catholic. In old times, Poland had a multicultural face, and we have to protect this face and work to protect them.

"We are looking for Poland, Szukamy Polski, [which] existed for centuries, a Poland as heterogeneous as the Tower of Babel and that gloried in a rich and varied cuisine, a Poland that astonished and amazed foreigners, but which was familiar and made sense to those born here," he said.

He noted that Ukrainians, Lithuanians, Lemkes, Germans, Tartars, Russians, Karaites and Roma also "made brilliant contributions not only to our [Polish] national and cultural inheritance and to our way of thinking, but also to our cuisine and language."

Those cultures cannot be omitted from any part of Polish history, "even though Poland did not always behave towards them as a loving mother – in fact often more like a wicked stepmother," he added.

Wisniewski's website, the A to Z Gallery of Prewar Poland (www.aforgottenodyssey.com/gallery/Poland-Photos-pre-1945), can be viewed in nine languages, including Hebrew. The Hebrew version can be accessed from www.szukamypolski.com/gap/index.php?l=isr. The website features 9,000 prewar images.

The website's museum will exhibit thousands of original prewar postcards and photographs that reflect a multicultural Poland. Anyone will be able to look for their own or their family's hometown and scan the postcards and photographs, which will also have commentary, Wisniewski said.

The site will also have an interactive tool that will enable people to exhibit their own material and to make contacts all over the world.

The aim of the website "is to construct a central online forum for serious debate about Poland, to help build up a corpus of knowledge about the country, to stimulate the minds of secondary school pupils, and to provide access to a wide range of information," Wisniewski said

He is also working on a website documenting the colours on pre-1945 Jewish gravestones in Poland (www.aforgottenodyssey.com/gallery/albug36). "Many gravestones were painted before the Second World War, especially in the smaller Jewish cemeteries," he said.

Other websites and links Wisniewski recommends are:

- www.zchor.org/bialystok/bialystok.htm
- www.zchor.org/bialystok/announcement.htm

Canadians among the select in Jewish Sports Hall of Fame

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Take a look at the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame (IJSHF) website (www.jewishsports.net), and it immediately becomes apparent why the old myth of Jews and sports mixing like oil and water should be expunged forever.

The site clearly shows that in all categories of athletic endeavour and achievement, Jews have excelled, among them a number of Canadians.

IJSHF was inaugurated in 1981 in Netanya, Israel, to honour Jewish athletes worldwide who have performed at the highest levels. A partnership with Maccabi USA/Sports for Israel and the Wingate Institute for Physical Education and Sports, IJSHF is currently celebrating its silver anniversary year.

But it doesn't honour only sportsmen and sportswomen. The IJSHF also has a Pillar of Achievement Award, which recognizes those who have contributed to society through sports, and a Lifetime Achievement Award for those who have made a contribution to society and Israel.

Last year, Montreal-born Sidney Greenberg of Toronto, the one-time president of Maccabi Canada, received the Lifetime Achievement Award for his work with the Maccabi World Union, Canadian Olympic Committee and Basketball Canada.

Four Canadians have garnered the Pillar of Achievement Award: the late Sidney Halter of Winnipeg, the first commissioner of the Canadian Football League, from 1958 to 1966; Montreal's Ben Weider, for his leadership of the International Federation of Bodybuilders; Toronto's Irving Ungerman, one of Canada's greatest boxing promoters and a pivotal figure in bringing major league baseball to his city; and the late Julius "Goldie" Goldman, who moulded a Windsor, Ont., basketball team into silver medalists at the 1936 Olympic Games. Goldman was instrumental in eliminating the rule that required a "jump ball" after every basket.

The IJSHF has inducted six Canadians into its sports achievement ranks, which now have some 250 members, among them famed pitcher Sandy Koufax, swimmer Mark Spitz and the late sports broadcaster Howard Cosell.

In chronological order, the Canadians are:

• Montrealer Louis Rubenstein, inducted in 1981, who won the gold medal at the very first World Figure Skating Championships. As the IJSHF website duly notes, Rubenstein was "North America's first famous figure skater, and ultimately won the titles in the United States and North America several times."

• Fanny "Bobbie" Rosenfeld, inducted in 1982 and now deceased, who in 1950 was named by Canadian sportswriters as "Canada's Female Athlete of the Half-Century." She was arguably Canada's greatest female track-and-field athlete from that era, setting records in numerous events and garnering a gold medal at the 1928 Olympics. In 1996, Rosenfeld was among five gold medalists whose images were put onto a Canadian stamp.

• Fred Oberlander, inducted in 1991, who was one of Canada's greatest wrestlers and one of the original founders of the modern Maccabi movement. He won several European and Canadian titles and, as a native of Austria, refused to represent his country at the German Olympics in 1936. In 1946, Oberlander competed for Great Britain at the Olympic Games, and in 1953, was named Outstanding Jewish World Athlete by David Ben-Gurion.

• Cecil Hart, inducted in 1992, who coached the Montreal Canadiens to back-to-back Stanley Cups in the 1920s and saw the team make the playoffs for the eight straight seasons he presided over it. Hart was a direct descendant of Aaron Hart, who is considered Canada's first Jewish settler. The Hart Memorial Trophy is presented every year to the National Hockey League's most valuable player.

• Red Fisher, inducted in 1999, who has been covering the Montreal Canadiens and the NHL for over a half-century in inimitable, witty style. Fisher, who turns 80 in August, is a two-time winner of the Canadian National Newspaper Award for sports-writing and was inducted into the Hockey Hall of Fame in 1995.

• Lew Hayman, inducted in 2004 and now deceased, who was involved in the Canadian Football League for close to 50 years and became a legend in the CFL. The IJSHF site notes that between 1933 and 1951, teams coached by Hayman, including the Toronto Argonauts, competed in five Grey Cup Championships and won them all.

Vujcic – a cut above the rest for Maccabi Tel Aviv

By YOAV BOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Many factors led to Maccabi Tel Aviv's dramatic away win recently over Hapoel Jerusalem: Sharon Sasson's cool play under pressure, Mario Austin's missed free throws, coach Pini Gershon's gutsy decisions. Without a doubt, however, Nikola Vujcic's 29 points and nine rebounds stood above them all.

At 27, Maccabi's Croatian centre is having the best season of his career, averaging 22.9 points and 6.4 rebounds a game in Israeli Premier League play as of late December.

"Vujcic is not the kind of player you come across every day," said assistant coach Dan Shamir.

But former Maccabi coach David Blatt, who brought Vujcic to the club four years ago, is a lot more enthusiastic. "When I started scouting Vujcic at Split, people weren't as excited as me," said the current Benetton Treviso coach. "I think the reason was his lack of athleticism. I saw he was a really smart and diverse player who understands the game intuitively."

Maccabi's assistant coach last year, Ya'akov Gino, also gets excited when talking about Vujcic.

"Despite his incredible individual ability, Vujcic is a team player of the highest level," Gino said.

"It's difficult to overstate just how much Vujcic brings to the game, especially because of his passing ability," added Gino, who called the Croatian "the big man's Jasikevicius," referring to Sarunas Jasikevicius, the Lithuanian guard who led Maccabi to two straight Euroleague championships and now plays in the NBA with the Indiana Pacers.

Vujcic – who scored 21 points and grabbed 10 rebounds in Maccabi Tel Aviv's 105-103 pre-season humiliation of the Toronto Raptors – also gets all-around accolades for his personality.

"He's a one in a million guy," Blatt said. "Honestly, he's one of my favourite players of all time."

Shamir echoes that opinion. "Nikola's contribution to Maccabi begins long before he steps on the court. He is always positive, always down to earth."

The question is will Vujcic remain with the back-to-back Euroleague champions, or will his play and personality see him follow Jasikevicius to the NBA.

"Everyone in the NBA is familiar with Vujcic," Blatt said. "But the NBA is a financial game, and Vujcic is already at a wage level where only a long-term, multimillion dollar offer is going to be attractive to him."

Vujcic has said on several occasions in the past that as far as he is concerned, "Maccabi is like the NBA." But the Croatian will certainly demand a significant increase over his estimated $650,000 (US) annual salary with Maccabi, and other teams will be ready to grab him if Maccabi does not pick up the tab.

"I have no doubt that Vujcic will receive five or six offers from European teams during the off season," said Blatt, who still can't figure out why the centre has yet to be snapped up by an NBA team.

"Every time I meet a friend from the NBA, I say: 'What the hell are you thinking. There are hardly any players like Nikola in the league.'"

Spielberg's Munich contributes nothing to Mideast debate

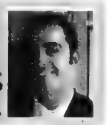
ARTS IN FOCUS
By Oren Shefa



When celebrated director Steven Spielberg takes on a project as contentious as the recently released Munich, it seems inevitable that audiences and critics alike will have lots to say. Terrorism, state-sanctioned retribution and politically charged racism, after all, are meaty subjects that can inspire many a heated debate.

Yet, despite combining a gritty political thriller with the kind of honest and painful introspection exhibited by the film's main characters, Munich fails to deliver on the expectation of an in-depth analysis and deliberation of the larger and more convoluted issues it arouses.

Since its limited release back in December, critics, historians and even Israeli military spokespeople have complained about numerous inaccuracies, simplifications of deeply rooted transgressions and ideological immaturity at the hands of the film's director, Spielberg, and screenwriter, Tony Kushner.

But what exactly was the expectation here? That Spielberg would, in the span of less than three hours, deftly dismantle millennia of hostility? Admittedly, the man is an extremely gifted storyteller, but as a mere mortal he brings to this issue his own emotional baggage, skewed perspectives and a penchant for being more than a little empathetic.

There is no question that the film, which touts itself in its opening titles as having been "inspired by real events," took liberties. Munich is an artistically masterful thriller drawing on real events in an effort to heighten the audience's sense of urgency, but its strengths have little to do with historical fact.

Based in large part on George Jonas' Vengeance – an account widely discredited by several experts – Munich details the 1972 kidnapping and murder of 11 Israeli Olympic athletes. The film, however, uses the impact of these acts of terror as a jumping-off point to address the larger issues surrounding the centuries-old Mideast conflict and the ripple effects felt in the West.

When peace is made with the fact that Munich is not a documentary (a claim it clearly never makes), the contention with the film becomes less about historical fallacy than about its tendency to paint a human face on an issue that has long since lost its humanity. Showing terrorists as freedom fighters pining for a usurped land can be interpreted as a justification for heinous actions, while portraying Mossad agents as anything other than wholly patriotic and unwavering in their protection of Israel projects an element of weakness and insecurity that seems to highlight the current civil strife running through today's Israeli community.

In Munich, Spielberg reminds us of mankind's propensity toward conflict. He tries to illustrate where policies of the past have failed, policies still being implemented today. He hands out blame in equal measure and warns us of impending doom by focusing on an image of the World Trade Center in the background of the film's final frame.

But after 164 minutes of watching the film's political posturing, we realize that we are back precisely where we started. Nothing new has been added to this discourse, and so the question remains, what was the point of it all?

By focusing more on giving both sides an equal voice, Spielberg shies away from making any sort of bold statement that would give this film the kind of push it needed to really stir things up. In the end, when it comes to the core issues surrounding Munich, that of effectively dealing with bitterly divided and hostile people, the film avoids the next precarious step of taking a stand and pushing the envelope so as to provoke a more meaningful dialogue.

Drugs: a followup

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Last month, I asked people who had suffered from the angst of growing up, or who have a child suffering from drug abuse, to write me. Here are paraphrased excerpts from some responses. I hope they help you.

Dear Avrum:

I just read your column, and as someone who recovered more than 20 years ago, as a teenager, from the "hellish roller coaster" you described, I sincerely empathize with the mother you spoke to. My memories and regrets from that period are so strong that hardly a day goes by when I don't spent time dwelling on those years of struggle.

Certainly, the lack of peace (or vision) in my home played a big part in eroding my sense of purpose, hope and focus. If there were one vision I believe would have changed my life at that time, it would have been tikkun olam (repairing the world).

Ideally, this vision would have been conveyed from within my family, but it wasn't. My next hope would have been to get help through school counsellors, which is where I actually did gain valuable insight.

I began going to the library to study. I managed to quit drugs and even graduated from high school, albeit a year late. My efforts to turn my life around did not go unnoticed by some of my fellow students.

Still, responsibility without purpose left me still drifting from pleasure to pleasure for a number of years, and this is where my discovery of tikkun olam as a central priority in my life filled in the rest of the gaps.

Now, as a new parent of a darling little girl, it's my hope and prayer that she never experiences a lack of peace or vision in our home.

Signed: Shalom in the home

Shalom Avrum,

Our son died in 2000 at age 30 of an accidental overdose. He was introduced to the drug that killed him in Israel, by a student at a party at a yeshiva who told him he would feel euphoric if he tried it.

Our son was a user, and not a constant one, for only a year, or even less, but one small dose in a clean body was all it took for him to leave us. We could not understand what happened to our son, so we started going to JACS, an organization that helps Jewish alcoholics and drug addicts, and their friends and families (www.jacstoronto.org).

Until an addict admits he or she has a problem and that they sincerely want to stop, there is no use going to meetings. Support is so important. If a user/addict knows they aren't alone, then we have accomplished something positive. We are all good people who want the best for our families, but sadly and unfortunately, we're not all so lucky.

P.S. It's been more than five years, and I'm still wracked with pain.

Dear Avrum:

My daughter moved out of the house on her 16th birthday. My older son tried to keep tabs on her. She said she was moving in with a friend. She stopped calling. I didn't know it at the time, but she had checked herself into a clinic for drug addicts. Shortly afterward, she went to live with a rabbi and his family, who said she showed a desire to get off drugs. She started attending meetings at JACS and Toronto East General Hospital. She just had her 17th birthday and has been drug-free for almost three months. We are very proud of her. [At meetings], she spoke of her addiction and I heard things about her that I never knew. I sat and listened, totally stunned. This was my child. Oh my God! One of the things she said was that you can't help an addict until they want to be helped.

Olmert faces tough decisions

Acting PM will be tested from now until election time

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Widely praised for the low-key and sensitive manner in which he has taken over from ailing Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Ehud Olmert is the odds-on favourite to win Israel's March 28 general election.

But the acting prime minister faces a number of severe early tests, and his continued popularity depends on how he copes.

First there is a potential flashpoint in Hebron, where young, right-wing Jewish extremists have been defying police and soldiers and challenging Olmert's authority.

Then there are a number of delicate issues regarding Palestinian elections on Jan. 25. Olmert has already had to make a call on whether there can be voting in eastern Jerusalem, and likely will have to decide in the immediate aftermath on Israel's attitude toward a Palestinian government including or even dominated by the terrorist group Hamas.

Analysis

In the run-up to Israel's own election, Olmert will have to decide how specific he wants to be about the possibility of a second Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank, following Sharon's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and northern West Bank last summer.

How Olmert deals with the Hebron challenge could set the tone for something much bigger – future Israeli withdrawals from large parts of the West Bank. The standoff has been over the government's intention to evict Jewish settlers from Arab property in the town's vegetable market. The settlers say the property was originally Jewish-owned, and they therefore claim legal title to it.

Last Friday, young radicals from different parts of the West Bank converged on Hebron to confront police and soldiers who were carrying out the evacuation. The radicals, many of them masked, went on a rampage Sunday, destroying and burning Palestinian property and pelting Israeli security forces with stones and eggs.

Ex-Montrealer is Israel's newest homeboy

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Most Israeli youth who bop to the beat of the new radio hit Kabel!!! (Check This Out!!!) have no idea it was done up by a Canadian.

But the unique "disco meets hip-hop" ditty is indeed one of 18 tracks on Chai (Life) – a Channel 24 best album of 2005 nominee, and the latest release by Canadian rapper Shai Haddad, aka SHI 360.

SHI 360 made aliyah from Montreal in November 2001. "I got here with two suitcases, a thousand Canadian dollars and a dream," recalls Haddad, 29, who left behind his job of five years as manager of operations at a direct marketing conglomerate to take the plunge. He made aliyah just three months after he returned to Montreal from a 10-day trip to Israel with birthright israel. "I had always dreamt of coming to Israel, but birthright was the last nail in the coffin," he says.

The move was nevertheless a long time in the making. Haddad tried to make aliyah in 1996, but was forced to return to Montreal.

"Until I arrived, I didn't realize how difficult it would be to live in Israel," he says, adding that one semester at the University of Tel Aviv was enough to convince him to complete his business degree at Concordia University in Montreal. "I decided to come back to Israel when I was mentally, emotionally, physically and financially stronger."

The stint in Israel was not without some success, since during his time there, he met Israeli hip-hop headliner Subliminal, with whom he established the T.A.C.T. Entertainment Group, which now handles Israeli rap stars Itzik Shamly, Sivan, Gavriel Butler and BooSkills. At the time, Subliminal went by the stage name "Caveman." It was Haddad who gave Subliminal his name.

Haddad's desire to move to Israel extends further back than 1996. Born in Haifa, Haddad moved with his family to Montreal when he was 11 years old. "The move to Canada was atrocious for me," says Haddad.

The News in Brief

Canada

Manor Appeals

TORONTO — The co-founder of the failed Toronto hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management appeared before Israel's Supreme Court last week to appeal an order to return allegedly ill-gotten diamonds or face a week in jail, the Globe and Mail reported. A Tel Aviv judge has twice ordered Boaz Manor, who fled to Israel last year after Portus collapsed and faces Ontario Securities Commission charges here, to return $9 million in gems that Portus's receiver, KPMG, contends he bought with firm funds. A ruling could come as early as this week.

World

Heirs Win Art Case

VIENNA — An Austrian arbitration court last week ordered the return of paintings to the heirs of their original Jewish owner. The ruling would return the works by Gustav Klimt, worth an estimated $200 million (US) to five heirs of Czech-Jewish businessman Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer. His niece, Maria Altmann, 89, sued Austria in 1999 to get back the paintings, which are still on display in Austria's Belvedere Gallery. The paintings were taken by the Nazis when Germany annexed Austria in 1938, the same year Bloch-Bauer fled the country. Three paintings will likely be transferred to Altmann, while two others, including a famous portrait of Altmann's aunt, would remain in the gallery and Altmann will be compensated for them.

Order Upheld

DETROIT — A U.S. appeals court upheld the decision to strip a Detroit man of his citizenship for lying about his World War II-era activities. The Jan. 12 decision strips Johann Leprich, 80, of his citizenship for lying about his participation in the Nazi Waffen SS when he came to the United States in 1958. The decision clears the way for Leprich, an ethnic German born in Romania, to be deported.

Annan in Map Flap

NEW YORK — The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations has asked Secretary General Kofi Annan to explain why he posed in front of a map that leaves out Israel. The New York Sun reported that John Bolton wrote to Annan Jan. 3 asking him why he attended a UN event, "The International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People," that featured the map. Annan's speech at the Nov. 29 event noted that Palestinian terrorism against Israelis was an obstacle to Palestinian progress. Bolton wants funding to be cut to the UN groups that organized the event, which are solely devoted to promoting the Palestinian cause.

Aliyah Interest Down?

PARIS — The number of people attending an annual Paris event focused on aliyah fell by more than half. Some 2,000 people came to the Jan. 15 Aliyah Day, which is organized by the Jewish Agency for Israel, compared to 4,500 a year ago. In early 2005, many Jews were fearful of anti-Semitic violence by North African youth, especially in suburbs of Paris. Aliyah Day this year came after a wave of Muslim rioting in November, but Jews were not targeted.

Robertson Apologizes

WASHINGTON — Israel's ambassador to the United States, Daniel Ayalon, has accepted an apology from Pat Robertson and planned to speak with the religious leader. Robertson apologized for saying Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's recent stroke was divine punishment for Israel's pullout from Gaza. Ayalon said Robertson has taken the outrage over his comments to heart. "I felt he was very sincere. He is a great friend of Israel," Ayalon said, adding he expected Robertson will again be allowed to take part in a project to build a Christian theme park in Israel.

Russian-Israeli Refugee Claimant Deported

ST. JOHN'S — A Russian-born Israeli refugee claimant who sought sanctuary with his family in a Marystown, Nfld., Catholic church was deported to Israel last week.

Alexi Portnoy, 34, came to Canada with his family in 1996 but was deported in 2000. They re-entered Canada illegally a year later and moved to Newfoundland in 2003.

Portnoy, whose father is Jewish, had been living in the church with his pregnant wife and four children – two of whom are Canadian citizens and don't face a deportation order – since September, but he was picked up by police last month for speeding after leaving the church to collect materials for a charity with a friend, Canadian Press reported.

In 2004, the family applied to stay in Canada on humanitarian grounds, but they were rejected reportedly because Portnoy had a car-theft conviction in Israel.

Supporters say one of their daughters has cystic fibrosis and can't get proper treatment in Israel, and he has said he doesn't want his children to face military service in Israel.

The couple is originally from Moldova and immigrated to Israel in 1991.

York school board pulls controversial children's book

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The York Region District School Board has pulled a controversial children's book about the Middle East from the prestigious Silver Birch Awards reading program for older elementary school students, but the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) will continue to make the book available to its students.

The book, Three Wishes: Palestinian and Israeli Children Speak by award winning author and anti-war activist Deborah Ellis, focuses on the testimony of Israelis and Palestinian children, and includes their views on everyday life and the Mideast conflict.

The Ontario Library Association (OLA) has vetted the book and recently included it as a nominee for its Silver Birch reading program, which is designed to encourage children in grades 4, 5 and 6 to read recreationally. School libraries stock the Silver Birch books and students can remove them and read them on their own, and not as part of the school curriculum. At the end of the school year, children vote for their favourite fiction and non-fiction book.

The OLA describes Three Wishes as allowing "young readers everywhere to see that the children caught in this conflict are just like them, but living far more difficult and dangerous lives. Without taking sides, it presents an unblinking portrait of children victimized by the endless struggle around them."

Critics, however, argue the book presents a uniformly negative image of Israel, provides little context for young readers about a conflict whose details are beyond their understanding, and introduces students to Palestinian youths who aspire to be suicide bombers and kill Israelis.

Late last week, the York Region board appeared to side with the critics.

"We will not be using Three Wishes as part of the Silver Birch selection," said Robert Dunn, superintendent of education for the York Region District School Board. "We've reviewed the material. It's not compliant with our policies, and it's not appropriate for the age group for which it is intended."

Dunn said if schools wish to use it for older students, they should "use it with caution in accordance with our learning resources guides to activity."

Tim Gauntley, program co-ordinator for libraries and learning resources with the TDSB, said the school board believes the book is "completely appropriate" and has no plans to restrict its availability to student readers. All the books available in the Silver Birch program are optional, Gauntley noted, adding "choices are made by students consulting with librarians and teachers.

"The point is to empower children to make independent reading choices" and to discuss the books with teachers, librarians and other students, he said.

Sarah Burakowski, a special education and resource teacher in the York Region school system who brought the book to Dunn's attention, said the book is "slanted, biased and inappropriate for children in grades 4 to 6... If this was [geared for] students in high school with the appropriate background knowledge, I would have no problem with it."

Burakowksi, who has been a teacher for 29 years, said the book demonizes the Israeli army and glorifies suicide bombers.

She said children participating in the Silver Birch program are not equipped to understand the complexities of the Mideast conflict or make sense of some of the Palestinian children's stated desire to either become a suicide bomber or applaud a sister who became one.

In Three Wishes, several Palestinian children say they hope they will be able to one day kill Jews.

Lively debates of policy

From the editor's desk

The annual Herzliya Conference in Israel has evolved into a key forum for the public debating of security-related policies by experts of all professional stripes and nationalities and of the floating of policy trial balloons by Israeli politicians and their policy advisers.

Now in its sixth year, the conference is organized by the Institute for Policy and Strategy at the Interdisciplinary Center (IDC), Herzilya. The high-intellectual-octane institute was founded and is headed by Uzi Arad, an internationally acknowledged thinker in matters of national security.

The conference this year began on Jan. 21 and concluded two days ago on Jan. 24. The CJN was fortunate to be there. Over the next few weeks, in this space, I will record some of my observations from the conference.

Since the conference last year, Israel unilaterally withdrew from the Gaza Strip and from four communities in the northern West Bank. Syrian troops left Lebanon. Mahmoud Ahmadinejad became president of Iran on Aug. 3, 2005. And elections were held in Iraq.

Last year's conference was held on the eve of Palestinian elections for president. Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat had died some weeks before. Most of the speakers spoke of great possibility hanging in the air then. This year's conference was held literally, on the eve of Palestinian elections scheduled for Jan. 25 and of Israeli elections scheduled two months later on March 28.

But the larger-than-life Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who has so dominated Israeli politics these past three years and who announced the policy of unilateral disengagement at this conference in 2003, is absent. He is, still, in a medically induced coma, fighting for his life, removed likely forever from public life.

The conference opened Saturday night, accentuating for everyone travelling to the seaside hotel where the conference is being held, the whirl and rush of frenetic post-Shabbat activity.

Among the more than half-dozen speakers Saturday night was Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz. He covered a number of subjects in his relatively brief remarks. Sounding nearly biblical in the severity of his words, he spoke directly to the leaders and the people of Iran. (Many presenters at the conference would speak about if not to the leaders of Iran. The subject of Iran's nuclearization was a prominent subject on the conference's agenda.)

"I suggest you take a look throughout history (was he referring to Haman and the story of Purim?) and see what has happened to others who tried to wipe out the Jewish people. The people of Iran should know that [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's policies will bring disaster upon them."

Without using categorical words, he actually sounded quite categorical on the subject of Iran's drive to acquire nuclear weapons capability. "Israel is committed to protecting itself and that is what it will do."

Israel (Robert) J. Aumann, of the Center for the Study of Rationality, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and a recent Nobel Prize laureate in economics, was one of the keynote speakers.

He spoke at length and emphatically, occasionally borrowing from some of the concepts of mathematics and game theory for which he won the Nobel Prize. He also spoke "politically" from his heart as much as from his prodigious mind, and as some people observed, quite provocatively, expressing open skepticism about the motives of the leaders of the PA and the Palestinian people.

"I fear that the number of the Palestinians who want to live in peace with Israelis is a minority. What are their true objectives?"

Aumann was critical of the Palestinian leaders. He demanded that they stop their incitement against Israel and the Jewish people. But he was also critical of Israeli leaders.

"But we are also guilty because we did not demand that they [the Palestinians] stop the incitement.

"And this [the unceasing incitement], in a sense, was even more horrible than the actual acts of terror. The small ones, who are taught to wipe Israel off the map, soon become grown-ups who hold on to that objective."

Aumann reminded the audience that Israel's neighbours have a very different sense of history. They take a longer view of the passage of time, recalling the evanescence of the Crusaders as merely a fleeting episode of Christian involvement in the eternity of unfolding time in the "Muslim part of the world."

He was clearly not supportive of the unilateral disengagement from Gaza. He felt it was a betrayal of the people whose lives had been uprooted as well as a glaring example of the failure to go slow in trying to change the other side's approach to accepting Jewish involvement in this part of the world.

"Our problem is that we are in a rush. We do not understand the future. But if we have patience and persuade the other side that we are prepared to wait for a long time and to keep the status quo, then perhaps we can arrive at true peace. Peace is much like honour. He who pursues it will find it elusive."

True peace and how to achieve it was the recurring theme, in many variations, throughout the four-day conference. And because, there were so many people speaking about it and thus, so many competing opinions, the discussions were quite lively.

Jewish groups say new bill targets beit dins

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Ontario's planned changes to family law arbitration were denounced last week as discriminatory and "blatantly" unfair to Jews.

Over two days of public hearings on Bill 27, which seeks to amend the 1991 Arbitration Act, Jewish groups said the government, in its quest to ban sharia-based Islamic tribunals, has targeted rabbinic courts, which have functioned unimpeded in Ontario since 1889.

It was the first chance Jewish organizations had to speak out on the bill, which they have charged was written without any input or consultation from them.

Last September, Premier Dalton McGuinty announced that "there will be no religious arbitration in Ontario. There will be one law for all Ontarians." His move capped two years of heated debate in Ontario over a proposal from a Muslim group to set up tribunals that would employ sharia, or Islamic law.

There was widespread fear that such panels would discriminate against women in matters of child custody and inheritance.

But McGuinty left the Jewish community concerned that his decision would extend to the rulings of rabbinical courts.

Since the Arbitration Act was enacted in 1991 to take pressure off courts, all rulings of a rabbinical court – a beit din – have been enforceable in a secular court, provided both parties consented.

Jewish groups are concerned that Bill 27 – which deals only with arbitration in family law, including child custody, inheritance and division of assets – could have the effect of stripping beit din rulings of their legal authority in these areas.

The bill also calls for family arbitrators to be trained members of "specified" dispute resolution organizations. As well, family arbitration would be conducted "exclusively in accordance with the law of Ontario," or of another Canadian jurisdiction.

In its submission to the legislative committee reviewing Bill 27, the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress said the legislation "overshoots its own intentions" and would lead to "unintended and undesirable results."

Although the words "faith-based arbitration" do not appear in the bill, its context "suggests it was intended to prevent such arbitration," stated Mark Freiman, honorary legal counsel for CJC's Ontario region and a former deputy attorney general of Ontario.

While Congress agrees that consent is required to appear before a faith-based arbitration panel, it said it does not agree that the solution is to remove the government's support for these procedures.

Rather than remove the state's support, the legislation "should stand strongly beside any woman who chooses to express herself through her faith, knowing she need not compromise her Canadian sensibilities," CJC's brief stated.

Family law arbitration, whether faith-based or not, is not inherently coercive, unfair or contrary to Canadian laws and values, Freiman said, adding that it is "insulting" to curtail the autonomy of faith communities.

Bill 27 would not eliminate faith-based arbitration but drive it underground, while costs of resolving family disputes and court wait times will both increase, CJC warned.

The focus should be on results of arbitration, not the process, it added.

Congress also noted that to its "dismay" that it was not consulted on the bill.

So did B'nai Brith Canada in its submission. Legal counsel Anita Bromberg told the committee that her organization was "largely ignored" in the process. She said it is the Jewish community that is "most unfairly burdened" by the bill, which would push faith-based arbitrations "further underground."

The next day, the Liberal-dominated committee rejected both of CJC's "suggested improvements" to the bill: a consent requirement for those entering arbitration, and an amendment stating that a family law arbitration is not enforceable unless it is compatible with the law of Ontario and the Charter of Rights.

The ranking Conservative on the committee, Bob Runciman, spoke in favour of the amendments, while the NDP's Peter Kormos voiced his party's opposition to efforts by private tribunals to have their decisions enforced by courts.

The ranking Liberal on the committee, Willowdale MPP David Zimmer, had no comment.

The most direct criticism of the legislation came from lawyer John Syrtash, who told the committee that the bill, as it stands, should be "completely withdrawn, not just amended or modified."

Appearing on behalf of the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto and several Orthodox groups, Syrtash called the bill "blatantly unfair" and a "harrowing, tragic mistake… unique in the world."

He hinted at a future court challenge, saying that if the bill is passed in its current form, the Vaad and others are "committed to defending the historic rights of the Jewish people in Ontario… since the government has no business in the synagogues of the nation."

Syrtash noted that the bill would enjoin courts from enforcing the ruling of a family law arbitrator if it was based on a non-Canadian legal system.

But such systems, he said, have been historically based almost exclusively on Jewish law and banning such enforceability "would likely" contravene the rights of Jews under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Syrtash also argued that the bill would effectively render all previous beit din rulings in family law void if they have not yet been incorporated into secular court rulings. He said the bill contains no transitional or grandparenting clauses for old rulings, something that would lead to more litigation and reopen "countless disputes going back several generations."

"Think what you're doing," he told MPPs.

The bill especially targets Orthodox women, he added.

"The Jewish concept of modesty – tznius– requires privacy. It is crucial to a Jewish woman's spiritual maintenance. This bill takes that right away from her. If you interfere with women's rights to privacy, you are on the road to tyranny."

Jewish law prohibits Orthodox Jews from taking fellow Jews to a secular court, said Syrtash. As well, the Orthodox do not want the "public glare and expense" of secular courts.

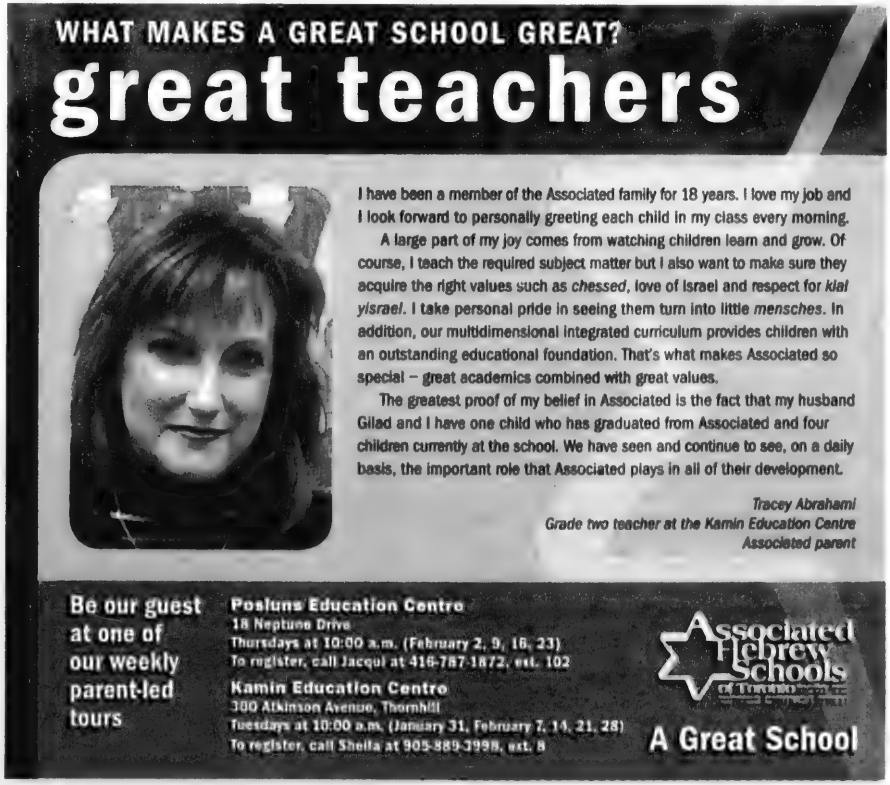
He said there have been no problems with family law rulings by rabbinic courts in more than a century – a fact he said was noted in an extensive report to the government supporting faith-based arbitration, written by former Ontario attorney general Marion Boyd.

Appearing with Syrtash was Rabbi Mordechai Ochs, head of Toronto's Beit Din Zedek, which issues Jewish divorce decrees – the get.

Though the legislation would not affect the issuing of gets, Rabbi Ochs said the law "cannot address a problem by taking rights away from others."

Jewish women, Rabbi Ochs said, "are not discriminated against. They enjoy the fact that they are treated as equals."

The bill now heads to third reading.



WHAT MAKES A GREAT SCHOOL GREAT?
great teachers
I have been a member of the Associated family for 18 years. I love my job and I look forward to personally greeting each child in my class every morning.
A large part of my joy comes from watching children learn and grow. Of course, I teach the required subject matter but I also want to make sure they acquire the right values such as chessed, love of Israel and respect for klal yisrael. I take personal pride in seeing them turn into little mensches. In addition, our multidimensional integrated curriculum provides children with an outstanding educational foundation. That's what makes Associated so special – great academics combined with great values.
The greatest proof of my belief in Associated is the fact that my husband Gilad and I have one child who has graduated from Associated and four children currently at the school. We have seen and continue to see, on a daily basis, the important role that Associated plays in all of their development.

Little context given to explain books, teacher says

One Palestinian girl, Wafa, 12, complains about Israeli military checkpoints, saying " the Israeli soldiers treat us like dogs. They make us stand and wait for no good reason, just because they can.

"Killing an Israeli will make me feel glad. It will make me feel strong… I am tired of them making me feel small and weak. I want to feel strong and proud."

Another Palestinian girl, Maryam, 11, said "there are women martyrs who do the suicide bombings. They are very brave… I have only one wish. I would like to go to heaven. Maybe in heaven there is happiness after we die. Maybe then."

Salam, the 12-year-old sister of suicide bomber Aayat Al-Akhras, who killed herself, a security guard and 17-year-old Rachel Levy at a Jerusalem market, said she would have made her sister a special breakfast on the day of her attack, had she known about it.

"I don't think it would hurt if I blew myself up. I don't think it hurt my sister. I think she was very brave, not scared at all. I think she was probably very happy," Salam said.

Though students can later discuss the book with a teacher, there is very little context and background given to explain the books, Burakowski said.

Similar concerns were voiced by a teacher/librarian in the Toronto school system, who did not want her name used. She said she and two non-Jewish teachers were concerned "that the children don't have enough knowledge of what is going on in the Middle East to figure out what is fact or opinion."

For instance, she said, one Palestinian girl asserts Israeli don't want her to do well in school. "That's not a fact, but it's something she's been taught to believe.

"I didn't feel, and neither did the other teachers, that the children here have the knowledge to understand the difference between opinion and fact."

Miriam Drazin, a teacher in York with 25 years experience, said the book presents "a very negative picture of Israel."

One example she pointed to was a Palestinian child claiming Palestinians drink one cup of water versus four cups drunk by Israelis. "I think if you hand the book out kids, will accept it as fact.

"I found it is so negative. They each hate the other side.

"One child talks about being a martyr. Is that what we want our children to be reading about?"

Peggy Thomas, chair of the OLA's selection committee, said she did not agree the book demonizes the Israeli army. She rejected criticism the book was not age-appropriate, saying young children can understand the book's underlying message that hate is something that is taught.

"I think that's something kids in grades 4, 5 and 6 will get," she said.

Thomas said the book does not take sides and the author, who she called "a remarkable human being," wanted to let the children speak for themselves.

"What you have here is what the children have expressed to her," Thomas said. "What she's done here is given them a place to voice their responses to what their lives are like."

References by Palestinian youngsters to suicide bombers "could be dealt with by supportive teaching," she continued. "This is what the children are feeling. I think what Deborah Ellis' idea was was to show how an environment warps children's perceptions."

"You have to teach about these things," she said. "It opens minds to what is happening in the world."

Children's book critic Jeffrey Canton said, "I feel quite passionately about this book. I feel it is an extremely brave attempt to give voices to a very complex situation.

"The notion that this is a situation far beyond the comprehension of children in these grades is troubling. Because, what are teachers and librarians for but to help give context… for these very complex issues."

Avi Benlolo, director of the Canadian office of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, called the book "very disturbing." It presents a gloomy "war-torn" picture of Israel with no reference to the fact it is a modern, first world country where people lead ordinary lives.

Benlolo said the book "can create a negative attitude about Israel and Jews."

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said "my initial take on the book is that the contents require a more mature reader. I believe the book may have some value, but children aged nine to 11 may be too young to understand a book and the real life events it describes."

"This is a book that gives children the opportunity to discuss their pain."

"The position Congress has always taken is that the schools have the responsibility to deal with sensitive issues in a sensitive manner," he added.

Canadian, Israeli doctors work together in Israel

Working to improve orthopedic surgery

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As part of an ongoing medical exchange program, Dr. Cari Whyne, a biomechanical engineer at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre in Toronto, was in Israel last month to share her expertise in orthopedic surgical technology with Israeli doctors.

Sunnybrook Hadassah Orthopedic Trauma Exchange (SHOTE) is a five-year-old initiative that involves Sunnybrook & Women's, the University of Toronto's faculty of medicine, the Hadassah Medical Center in Jerusalem, and the faculty of medicine at Hebrew University.

"We're always working in conjunction with clinicians, surgeons and scientists, developing methods to answer their questions and then translating that back to changing and improving clinical practice," Whyne said of her work at Sunnybrook.

Her Dec. 16-24 trip to Israel, sponsored by SHOTE, gave her the opportunity to develop both clinical and research collaborations with Israeli doctors, she said.

During her visit to Hadassah, Whyne worked to help improve the hospital's finite element modelling lab, which doctors use to better understand the inner workings of bones and muscular tissues.

She also worked with orthopedic trauma surgeon Dr. Amal Khoury, an Israeli Arab who spent a year at Sunnybrook treating pelvic trauma before returning to Hadassah last year.

While Whyne had much to offer the Israeli medical staff at Hadassah, she, along with Sunnybrook's orthopedic trauma surgeon and SHOTE chair Dr. Joel Finkelstein, also benefitted from the Israeli doctors' expertise about computer-assisted orthopedic surgery, which creates three-dimensional images to help surgeons realign bones.

Leonard Goodman, chair of SHOTE's financial advisory board, said that contrary to what people might think, the Israeli doctors are not the only ones benefiting from the exchange of ideas and research.

"We here in Canada are learning a great deal from Israeli resources. Most people do not understand that. What is Canada getting out of this? We're getting access to some terrific technology and brain power," he said.

"We have different strengths that can really compliment one another," Whyne added.

"[The Israeli orthopedic trauma surgeons at Hadassah] are the leaders of the clinical application of computer assisted orthopedic surgery," she said.

"There are excellent opportunities for collaborating some of the technologies we have here, and some of our engineering analyses, with the research and clinical abilities that they have there."

One of the areas that Israeli doctors were interested in learning about, Whyne said, was finite element modelling, which is used to better understand the inner workings of bones and muscular tissues.

"It can predict fracture," she said of the model. "If there is strain in a specific area, [we can predict] where it's going to break."

Although the doctors were interested in this technology, Whyne noted that the Hadassah doctors were mostly interested in her expertise in computer-assisted orthopedic surgery.

Role reversal, a 'strategic aim'

The line of Jewish history pushes – some say providentially, some say mysteriously, some say inexorably – forward. But most of us are able to see its path only by looking back. We seldom see it ahead because our vision is often clouded by ephemeral clutter. And even less frequently do we steer its course, though it is often imperative that we try.

The editorial in the Jerusalem Post of Jan. 20 was an urgent effort to etch that line deep into the consciousness of Jews around the world. Titled "Save the Diaspora," it commented on the release last week of the second annual report by the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute on the state of world Jewry. Specifically, the editorial writer lamented the seemingly unstoppable decline in the number of Jews living outside the State of Israel and urged the new Israeli government that will be elected on March 28 to "formally define the revitalization of the Diaspora as a strategic aim."

Some 58 years year after the State of Israel came into existence, the roles between the two broadly labelled Jewish communities – Israel and the Diaspora – are essentially being reversed.

When Israel was born, there were more than 10 times the number of Jews living in the United States than in the nascent Jewish state. Today the populations are approximately equal. Indeed according to renowned Hebrew University demographer Sergio DellaPergola, merely 45,000 more Jews live in the United States today than in Israel.

On the one hand, it is a remarkable story of the courageous, resolute rebuilding of the ancient Jewish homeland and the restoring to sovereign self-rule of the long-suffering, long-ago displaced Jewish people. On the other hand, however, it is also the sad, disheartening story of the modern assimilation of western Jewry.

In short course, given demographic trends, Israel will have the largest Jewish population of any community in the world. Many will contend that is as it should be. But no one will suggest it should be that way because of the unceasing decline in the number of Jews outside Israel. DellaPergola noted that the current population of the Diaspora is 7.5 million people. Over the past 35 years, the number has actually shrunk by some 2.25 million – and not because of aliyah. Though not as alarming as the numbers in the United States, the demographic pattern for Canadian Jews is hardly encouraging, as emeritus professor Leo Davids of York University recently wrote in The CJN.

If Israeli leaders are being urged to "save the Diaspora," the task falls first and foremost to us, the Jews of the Diaspora, and to our leaders.

The prescription is an old one.

But the resolve must be new.

The lines of Jewish life must be indelible and is is our responsibility to write them.

The ban on Rabbi Slifkin's work (1)

In "The Slifkin affair: a lament for Orthodoxy" (CJN, Jan. 12), Joseph Yossi Adler seems to use the argument that the "the vast majority of the western world has accepted the age of the universe and certain other well-established scientific principles" as a means of decrying the fact that leaders of the haredi community have imposed a ban on Rabbi Nosson Slifkin's work. Surely, he must realize that the annals of scientific history are replete with once well-accepted principles that have long since been abandoned as irrelevant or untrue.

Moreover, Judaism has never held to the idea of accepting as true the beliefs of the world outside its own hallowed traditions. Its very survival to this day is proof of that.

Those who occupy the rarefied air of leaders like Rabbi Shlomo Miller didn't attain their status by chance. They have done so by having continuously demonstrated not only an unequaled breadth of Torah knowledge, but as well the spirit of wisdom necessary to translate that knowledge into rulings applicable to modern times.

The words chosen by Rabbi Miller and others who have spoken out against Rabbi Slifkin may not be the ones we would have chosen ourselves to express in casual conversation, but insofar as they come from one of unquestioned authority, they must of necessity be chosen to convey not only ideas, but the sense of urgency those ideas require. Nor can I acquiesce to the idea Rabbi Miller's condemnation was meant to quash the debate, for here we see Adler debating with as much vigour as ever.

Rabbi Miller did nothing more than what his community expected him to do. He expressed a point of view on a controversial matter, one that he alone was capable of expressing. Surely, this was nothing less that Rabbi Slifkin himself was expecting.

The ban on Rabbi Slifkin's work (2)

I recently had the privilege of hearing Rabbi Nosson Slifkin speak at a Torah In Motion seminar. I thoroughly enjoyed his speech and have begun reading one of his books, Seasons of Life, which is equally interesting. I would like to see the ban on his writing lifted, so his books can be enjoyed by more people.

Closing of breastfeeding clinic

I was dismayed, but not entirely surprised, that a North York General Hospital spokesperson was quoted as saying that "not all women breastfeed… it is a personal choice" when asked about the rationale for closing Dr. Jack Newman's breastfeeding clinic ("Advocate fights to reopen breastfeeding clinic," CJN, Jan. 12).

From this comment, it seems that hospital budget-makers believe that life would be simpler if more women fed their babies with formula. This makes no sense at all.

Even a brief exploration of the topic will reveal to anyone the endless advantages of breastfeeding. However, some women need support – not just hand-holding, but skilled instruction and sometimes medical assessment – to nurse infants optimally. Without these resources, more women will certainly turn to formula feeding, because it is touted as being "simpler."

What a shame that the only MD-supervised lactation clinic in Toronto is not deemed worthy of a hospital-based location. As a new mother, I am grateful to Newman as a patient, and I know of many mothers in the Jewish community who have visited his clinic. As an MD, I continue to be grateful to Newman for his tireless efforts to educate his colleagues, myself included.

Kehilat Or Hadash not egalitarian

Kehilat Or Hadash (KOH) was mistakenly described as a "New egalitarian minyan aimed at young Jews" in The CJN (Jan. 19). While we do believe that our new minyan is innovative, creative and dynamic, we do not describe it as egalitarian.

KOH attempts to push gender boundaries in many respects, however, there are not identical roles for women and men in the realm of tfillah. Pushing the limits of a Halachic framework, KOH encourages women to lead Psukei D'zimra and parts of the Torah service, as well as participate in giving divrai Torah. At the same time, however, KOH davens with a traditional mechitzah and men lead portions of the tfillah that are dvar she'bkedushah, such as Shacharit and Musaf.

While KOH does not offer identical opportunity for men and women to participate in davening, it does offer equal opportunity for space, comfort and dialogue.

Munich not faithful to my book, author says

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Everything old is new again.

That expression has gained renewed cachet with the 2005 rerelease of George Jonas' Vengeance (Simon & Schuster), the 1984 book that is the basis for Steven Spielberg's controversial film Munich.

Jonas' equally controversial book, which tells the dramatic story of the Israeli Mossad's hunting down of the Palestinian terrorists responsible for the massacre of 11 Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics, made a clear moral distinction – reiterated in its last paragraph – between terrorism and counterterrorism. The $70 million Hollywood movie, by many accounts, does not, adding a key scene that offers up the Palestinian point of view and others in which the Mossad agents engage in constant questioning of their mission.

Sitting in the lobby café of a local hotel, Jonas, voice hoarse from all the interviews he's done about the movie in recent weeks, seems almost bemused about the furor over the film adaptation, which he also addressed in a recent Maclean's magazine cover story about the ongoing run-ins he had with various people involved with the film over the last five years. "The interesting thing is that the film actually is quite faithful, perhaps slightly more faithful, to the letter of the book than I would have been had I made a film of it. What it is not faithful to is the fundamental spirit of the book," says Jonas.

In Maclean's, he wrote: "The book has no trouble telling an act of war from a war crime; the film finds it difficult. Spielberg's movie worries about the moral trap of resisting terror; my book worries about the moral trap of not resisting it." Fortunately, Jonas says, "There have been a handful of reviewers, in the New York Times, the Weekly Standard, who actually bothered reading the book before making comparisons between the movie and the book. [They] saw the fundamental difference between the conclusions of the book and the conclusions of the film"

George Jonas

However, most journalists, whether defending or attacking Spielberg's film, have also taken a swipe at Jonas' book, deeming it inaccurate or saying its veracity has been called into question, specifically concerning the "existence" of the Mossad team leader, Avner, the non-descript Israeli whom Jonas was introduced to in hopes he would tell his story in a book.

Says Jonas, "The use of the word discredited when you mean to say attacked or denigrated comes from a limited understanding of the English language, without which it is difficult to be a journalist. The book had been denigrated and attacked by various sources, both when it came out the first time and after the reissue [with the new subheading "The True Story of an Israeli Counter-Terrorist Team"]. A number of people who want to attack Spielberg for a whole variety of reasons his take on history, his interpretation – find it a natural start to say that his film is based on a discredited book. It's a kind of an in to attack Spielberg.

Steven Spielberg's Munich was based on George Jonas' book.

"Personally… like every writer, I would be happier if there were no suggestion about the book's research lacking or being in any way in doubt," Jonas adds, sending this interviewer to the new edition of Vengeance and the 15-page afterword he says addresses all the criticisms of the initial book. "I feel quite comfortable about my research [for the book]."

Malcolm Lester, whose then-company Lester & Orpen Dennys co-published the book with Collins in 1984, stands by the book's truthfulness, as well, provocatively adding that many of the broadsides against it "may come from the Mossad who want to create disinformation.

"I can only guess that," he added, pointing out that when Vengeance first appeared Israel's spy agency denied even engaging in targeted assassinations. ("Today," says Jonas, "you see examples of counterterrorism on television, on CNN news; you see an Israeli missile launched to strike a terrorist enclosure on the West Bank.")

Lester also met Avner and says, "I have no doubt that Avner at one level is who he says he was; whether all the details [he gives] are true… [But] I think George got at the truth of what was going on."

Jonas had nothing to do with Sword of Gideon, the 1986 four-hour TV movie also based on the book. (It comes out on DVD on Feb. 28.) "It's a bit of a plodding movie," Jonas says. That was also when the rights for the book were sold to Alliance, now Alliance Atlantis, who then sold them to Spielberg and company. "I would not have had that choice of not selling to Spielberg," he says, "but frankly had I had that choice, I would have sold it [to him]."

Controversy, like that swirling around Munich, is nothing new to the Hungarian-born Jonas, who still exudes a gentle old-world European charm, despite having spent most of his life in Canada. (He emigrated from Hungary after the Soviet-quashed 1956 uprising.) His strong opinions, such as those decrying Communist holocausts as comparable to the Shoah, have been manifest in his columns for the National Post, which he's been writing since the newspaper's inception in 1998, and in his syndicated newspaper column for CanWest Publications, which date back to the mid-'90s. (He writes one column a week each for the Post and CanWest.)

Jonas was the writer/ producer/ director of the award-winning The Scales of Justice, dramatizations of landmark and interesting judicial cases that Jonas did for both CBC radio and television from 1981 to '96. David Cronenberg directed a TV segment of the show in 1990 when he was in between movies.

Jonas writes regular columns for The Canadian Lawyer, the Toronto Sun and Toronto Life magazine, and he has written several works for the stage such as the full-length play Pushkin and more than a dozen books. His memoirs, Beethoven's Mask: Notes on My Life and Times (Key Porter Books), came out last fall, around the same time he celebrated a milestone 70th birthday.

His major birthday and the release of Beethoven's Mask were just a coincidence ("I was actually a year too late [with the book]. It took me longer to write," says Jonas). But it prompts a question as to whether he's surprised at how his life turned out. "I came here like any immigrant, doing all kinds of jobs, from being a taxi driver to parking-garage attendant. For me, it seems pretty much what people do. I know that most people are not writers, [so] in that sense it was unusual. Whether you're a writer or a dentist makes very little difference. You learn how to handle the tools of your trade and then you handle them."

Despite his success as a writer/ producer/ director, and for the last 20-plus years as a freelancer, Jonas has always felt like an outsider. He tells the story of when he parked cars for the members of Toronto's tony Granite Club. "A Granite Club member couldn't place my accent and he said, let the Martian park my car. In many ways, he was accurate.

"I was always a bit of a Martian in any group. I did not fully belong to any group that I nominally was a member of, whether it was fellow writers, fellow Hungarians or fellow Canadians or fellow Jews or fellow lyric poets or fellow motorcycle racers. I was never quite at home [with them], so in that sense I was a bit of an outsider."

That's a description that many writers and artists would embrace, he adds. "If you were to ask me a question, do I belong to a group called outsiders, the answer may be yes."

Politically, Jonas is often perceived as a right-winger, probably since his employers at the Post and Can West have that reputation and since he does tend to buck the liberal-left trend prevalent in a good part of the Canadian media. He disputes that label. "I do not see myself as a libertarian. I certainly don't see myself as a neoconservative. I see myself as a classical liberal. My political views I derive from 19th-century liberalism, [from] John Stuart Mill, the kind of liberalism derived from the Scottish philosophers, not from the French revolution." It's a liberalism that he regards "as an organic property of existence, not a gift of the state."

He refers to the late John F. Kennedy's famous dictum, "Ask not what your country can do for you but what you can do for your country." "I would have some difficulties with that," says Jonas. "I believe that it's the country that exists for its individuals, for its people, rather than the individual for the country."

Those views come into contentious play today in our post-9 /11 world. "9 / 11 has awakened people to one danger, the danger of international terrorism, a certain totalitarian streak of Muslim theocracies" he stresses. "But in another sense, it's increased the aspect of statism in many areas, in the name of security. It's not because [the need for security] is not real, but it can serve as an excuse for that all-encroaching state to interfere with more and more aspects of your existence and develop more and more control over your life as an individual, on the basis that it's doing it for your own security. The paternalism of the state has been increased."

If so, it's a safe bet that Jonas will continue to sound the warnings against that paternalism and all the other pernicious ideologies that he fears affect us all.

Media biases revisited

When reflecting on the past five years of the Mideast conflict, there's no doubt that Israel has been able to defend itself militarily, and convincingly so. By contrast, it's had much less success on the public relations and media fronts, where, time and again, unbalanced coverage has given the Palestinian cause many an undeserved victory. The reasons for this are complex. And while it's generally recognized that the stereotype of Israel as the aggressor and the Palestinians as the interminable victim remains a dominant theme on the universal propaganda screen, challenges to such imagery have been mostly insufficient and ineffective.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

In her recently published book The Other War: Israelis, Palestinians and the Struggle for Media Supremacy (Encounter Books, 2005), journalist Stephanie Gutmann skillfully examines this phenomenon, with a particular focus on the dynamics that have driven elements of Israel's foreign press corps to ever loftier heights of sensationalist, and seriously flawed, reporting.

In one chapter, titled "If it bleeds, it leads," she describes the cynicism of bureau chiefs and senior editors who tend to pursue, at all costs, the guts and gore that they perceive to be intrinsically newsworthy. In other sections, she goes behind the scenes to explore the sometimes murky domains of the "fixers" – those indispensable Arab translators who, in Gutmann's words, also double up as a foreign correspondent's "native guide, driver, and maker of introductions."

And it comes as no great revelation that these "media assistants," as the fixers prefer to be called, inevitably "control what reporters see, whom they meet, and even every word they hear." Many of them, we're told, have trained at the Media Institute of Bir Zeit University in Ramallah, where, incidentally, Hamas candidates last year won a majority of student council seats on a platform of having killed more Jews than any other group running for election!

Whole chapters of Gutmann's text are devoted to contextualizing some of the most flagrant media distortions to have emerged from the intifadah – including the "massacre that wasn't" at Jenin and the chicanery surrounding the shooting of 12 year old Mohammed al-Dura. The al-Dura incident, we'll recall, pointed the finger of blame at Israeli soldiers and added instant fuel to an already explosive situation. It was only months later that forensic evidence demonstrated that Palestinian, and not Israeli, bullets were the likeliest cause for the boy's death.

The Other War is both absorbing and informative. Through well-researched examples and the personal experiences of its author, it reminds us that the news and those who mould it are not to be taken at face value – and all the more so when matters as intricate as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict are the subject of discussion.

We backed Sharon in his hour of near-greatness

Every morning at dawn, I hop over to the Machane Yehuda food market to buy fresh bread for my kids' lunches. That's when I tune into the talk of the day among the vendors. If the latest soccer or basketball match isn't on their minds, politics is sure to be the next best thing.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

Making my way groggily between the various stalls on Erev Shabbat, Jan. 13, as our country's prime minister lay unconscious in Hadassah Hospital, I was struck by how normal the overall mood was. I had expected a pall of glum silence to have settled over everything, punctuated now and then by muted murmurings of sympathy and even despair. After all, one of the most venerable personalities in Israeli public life for the better part of the past half century, and the country's unchallenged political leader, was in grave condition.

Quite to the contrary, the air was electric with energy and anticipation, as it is each and every Friday while merchants frantically prepare for the coming tide of weekend shoppers. There was little hint of a country beset by deep crisis. Indeed, not a single thread of conversation about "Arik" reached my ears during my brief walk.

On the one hand, I was somewhat encouraged by the fact that the tried and tested routines of life were proceeding apace, undisrupted. It strengthened my faith in the essential stability of our society. There was this widespread confidence, apparently, that nothing fundamental to our survival and security had come under any kind of serious threat as a result of the prime minister's illness. People retained their belief that the ship of state was a seaworthy vessel, not so easily steered off course by even the severest of political storms.

And yet, the more I thought about it, the odder it all seemed. There was not even a whisper of the name "Sharon" during the 15 minutes I'd spent in the market? Mere coincidence? Perhaps. I could not help but contrast, however, this mood of perceived calm with the profound outpourings of personal and public grief, and the sense of irreplaceable loss, that followed prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination some 10 years earlier. For in spite of all the differences, there was also a point of convergence, namely that now, as then, we, the people of Israel, were being robbed of the single individual who, through his personal prestige, clout, conviction and determination, had enabled our country to take some of the most difficult, risky and fateful decisions in its history.

And, indeed, all the way home I debated with myself about whether I was being misled by my own biased perceptions. Just because I had trouble feeling for Ariel Sharon, did that necessarily mean that others did as well? Surely not everyone continued to dwell, as I always did, upon the deeds and misdeeds of the younger, leaner and meaner Sharon of years gone by – the one whose name was associated with acts of brutality in places such as Qibya and Sabra and Shatila. Surely not everyone, like me, bore him a permanent grudge for the way he'd betrayed me, one of his soldiers, and our prime minister, Menachem Begin, too, during the war in Lebanon. And how many others continued to resent him, I wondered, for the way he had squandered national resources in a grossly miscalculated settlement extravaganza?

It had been easier, I decided at last, to grieve for Rabin. He'd possessed the human frailty and stuttering diffidence of a tragic hero, whereas Sharon would be remembered for his bewildering inconsistency, for a career marked by a mix of heroism, headstrong impetuousness, raw opportunism, outright callousness, occasional pragmatism and a dramatic, last-minute and almost noble reinvention of himself and his ideology.

And if many of us lined up loyally behind this latter-day Sharon, it was despite the lingering hurt and disgust. It was because there was a final hour of near-greatness, when at long last, and with the full force of his wilful character, he'd mounted a heroic charge towards a more feasible future. And not necessarily because we loved him all that much, or had quite forgiven him everything.

The pragmatic centre will carry Sharon's legacy

In the five years he served as Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon completely altered both Israeli politics and Israel's complex relationship with the Palestinians.

In early 2001, when Sharon brought down what remained of Ehud Barak's Labor government after the failed Camp David summit, Israel faced a well-planned terror campaign. Moving deliberately, even after mass terror bombings against buses and cafes, Sharon kept Israeli society united while isolating and eventually defeating Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, both militarily and politically. This was Sharon's second strategic success (his first came as a tank commander in the 1973 war), and it completed his political comeback after the disastrous Lebanon campaign in 1982.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

But Sharon also worried about the instability of a stalemate and the growing threats, particularly from Europe, to impose an illusory "quick solution." He recognized that it will take years, or even decades, for Palestinians to accept the compromises necessary for a negotiated settlement. Thus, in an attempt to avoid Israel disappearing into a growing Palestinian population or being forced back to insecure and undefendable borders, Sharon ended Israel's presence in Gaza.

Only a leader with Sharon's credentials could have taken the traumatic step of dismantling settlements he himself had built – and he did so in the absence of a peace treaty and without provoking a civil war. (Critics in the Likud party noted that former prime minister Menachem Begin at least received a peace treaty with Egypt in exchange for the Sinai).

Sharon did not invent the unilateral disengagement strategy, which also includes the construction of a north-south physical barrier that demarcates a de facto border with the West Bank. The strategy was forced on him by a wide Israeli consensus that recognized there was no better alternative available. The Israeli public had become more pragmatic and centrist than its leaders, and Sharon understood that he could either accept this reality or be swept away in its wake. He chose the former, losing his political base in a fractured Likud, but discovering a bigger one in the centre.

This large, pragmatic and centrist political consensus is likely to carry Sharon's final political legacy for many years. Most Israelis have abandoned faith in grand peace plans, including the internationally sponsored "road map," that end in catastrophe. And, as opinion polls have shown consistently, most Israelis – not enthusiastically, but as the least bad option – favour separating from the Palestinians to the maximum extent possible, depending on security and stability details.

However, without Sharon to lead this process, Israel's political realignment will probably take longer. Instead of the "big bang" that seemed ready to propel Sharon quickly into a new era of Israeli politics, the process may proceed more slowly and with hesitation, and Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu may be able to repatriate enough Likud voters to catch up with Kadima, which remains far ahead in the polls and is led, for now, by acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Even if Sharon had remained healthy and done well in the March 28 Israeli election, further separation moves in the West Bank would have been much more difficult than the Gaza withdrawal. Instead of the hoped-for Palestinian moderation and emphasis on vital economic development (based on huge aid packages channeled through the World Bank), the reality in Gaza has been chaos and more terror.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas is barely a figurehead, while the role of Hamas continues to grow. And along what remains of the border with Gaza, Egyptian guarantees to prevent the smuggling of weapons and terrorists have disintegrated. As a result, even the most pragmatic Israelis will be far more cautious about withdrawing from areas that would bring Tel Aviv and Jerusalem into rocket-firing range.

In the meantime, Israelis can be expected to look hard at potential successors to Sharon. Security is still central, and Israel is still at war, not only against Palestinian terror and rejectionism, but also against Iranian threats of nuclear genocide. But a successful Israeli leader must also demonstrate the political skills needed to work closely with the United States, and, when possible, Europe. Like former prime ministers Ben-Gurion, Begin, and Rabin, Sharon will leave an enduring legacy in both dimensions.

France 'declares war' on anti-Semitism

For the past five years, Jews in France have been subjected to a series of random attacks targeting individuals, synagogues, schools and cemeteries.

The incidents, the worst in decades, have ranged far and wide.

Sheldon Kirshner in Paris

In Paris, a man leaving a shul in the 19th arrondissement was hospitalized after being assaulted, and near Lyons, a couple was beaten severely. A shul was burned to the ground in Marseille, a sports club was torched in Toulouse and a secondary school in the Paris suburb of Gagny was gutted by arson. In Bordeaux, a 16-year-old teenager was set upon, and in Paris, a bus parked beside a Lubavitch school was stoned. Meanwhile, in Strasbourg, graves in a cemetery were desecrated.

Most of the estimated 600,000 Jews in France have not been affected by the violence, but the shock waves have touched almost everyone in the Jewish community, the largest in Europe. Still, there is a recognition that, as serious as these incidents have been, they have not resulted in fatalities, as in previous cases of post-war anti-Semitism.

In 1980, gunmen reportedly affiliated with Abu Nidal, the Palestinian terrorist, bombed the Copernic synagogue in Paris, killing four people. At the height of the 1982 war in Lebanon, terrorists believed to be Palestinians bombed Jo Goldenberg's restaurant in the Marais, a quaint Jewish district in Paris, killing six people and wounding 22. Eight years later, in 1990, five neo-Nazi skinheads vandalized an ancient Jewish cemetery in Carpentras, disinterring the recently buried corpse of Felix Germon and impaling him on a beach umbrella. Profoundly shaken by this desecration, one million Parisians turned out in a demonstration to protest anti-Semitism.

Observers generally believe that the latest manifestations of anti-Semitism were prompted by two interrelated factors: Israel's handling of the second Palestinian uprising and the rise of Islamic fundamentalism in the Muslim community, which comprises one-tenth of France's overall population.

Racist and anti-Semitic incidents nearly doubled in 2004, hitting a decade-high level, says a report issued by the National Consultative Commission of Human Rights and presented to the then prime minister, Jean-Pierre Raffarin. The commission recorded 1,565 threats and violent attacks, and of those, 970 were anti-Semitic in nature, compared with 601 in 2003.

Reflecting on these incidents, Haim Musicant declared, "They represent the most serious attacks against Jews in France since World War II." This is quite an indictment, as Musicant is director general of France's leading national Jewish organization, the Conseil Representatif des Institutions Juives de France, better known as CRIF.

"What happened here was something new," he explained in an interview. "People thought that, because of Auschwitz, anti-Semitism was finished in France. So they were shocked."

Jean-Marc Dreyfus, a professor at the Institut d'Etudes Politiques whose specialty is the Holocaust in France, said that the traditional source of anti-Semitism in this country, the xenophobic extreme right, has not played a major role in the latest attacks.

Many of the attackers have been poorly educated, embittered Muslim youths of North African origin from depressed housing projects who sympathize with the Palestinian cause and who themselves have been victimized by racism and hobbled by high rates of unemployment.

Marilou Jampolsky, an official at SOS-Racisme, a Paris-based organization dedicated to fighting racial prejudice, finds this to be a supremely ironic situation, brimming with psychological implications.

By Musicant's count, 40 per cent of the assaults have been carried out by Arab and African Muslims who feel oppressed and marginalized by French society.

He estimates that a further 40 per cent of the attackers have been "thrill-seekers" and "publicity-seekers" bent on generating sensationalist newspaper headlines, while the other 20 per cent of the perpetrators have come from the far right, which historically, has singled out Jews, Muslims and Africans.

The most visible right-wing political extremist in France today is Jean-Marie Le Pen of the National Front. To everyone's surprise, he polled 17 per cent of the vote in the first round of the 2002 presidential election.

Dreyfus – a distant relative of Alfred Dreyfus, the Jewish army captain whose sacking and imprisonment convulsed and divided Belle Epoch France – argued that the upsurge of open animus against Jews is rooted both in anti-Semitism and juvenile delinquency.

Yet violent anti-Semitism, a phenomenon common in other European countries as well, is not the sole concern of Jews in France.

Haim Musicant

Last summer, for example, a court in Versailles condemned two passages in an inflammatory article on the Arab-Israeli conflict published by Le Monde, the New York Times of France.

The offensive sentences in the liberal daily referred to Jews as "a people dominating and sure of itself" and "a contemptuous people getting satisfaction by humiliating." In its ruling, the court criticized the authors for equating Jews with the Israeli government.

As worrisome as these incidents have been, French Jews can take some solace from two indisputable facts.

First, last autumn's riots in France, spearheaded by Muslims and Africans of Muslim descent, were neither anti-Semitic in tone nor action.

Second, the number of anti-Jewish acts dropped by almost 50 per cent in 2005. Roger Cukierman, the president of CRIF, ascribed the decline to sincere and concerted efforts by the French government to deal with the issue.

This is indeed true, both on a rhetorical and an operational level.

When French President Jacques Chirac met Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel last July, Chirac told Sharon he was totally committed to wiping out "the scourges of our time: terrorism, racism and anti-Semitism."

Dominique de Villepin, the French prime minister, was just as forceful. In a speech last summer marking the 63rd anniversary of an infamous roundup of Parisian Jews, he promised to work tirelessly to fight anti-Semitism.

Still other high-ranking government officials, notably Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, a future presidential candidate, have stated that when a Jew is threatened, the French republic itself is threatened.

In practical terms, France has taken concrete steps to assuage fears in the Jewish community that it is not serious about combating anti-Semitism.

Police are out in force protecting Jewish property. When I visited CRIF headquarters, several armed police officers stood guard in front.

Courts are adopting a tougher approach to criminals motivated by racial animosities. The ministry of education has implemented measures aimed at defusing xenophobia, racism and anti-Semitism.

"The government is doing its job," said Musicant, who has good relations with the ministry of interior, which monitors anti-Semitism. "It decided to declare war on anti-Semitism."

Musicant believes that, while the government's zero tolerance attitude toward anti-Semitism has achieved results, the cooling of the intifadah has also had an impact.

David Kornbluth, Israel's acting ambassador to France, said that while France was initially slow to understand and address the magnitude of the problem, the government has since made amends.

"They're very, very strong about it now. They're using the full resources of the state. France is a model in Europe in dealing with anti-Semitism."

Dreyfus contends that the North American media has failed to present a balanced picture of the anti-Semitic attacks. "The way it was described was exaggerated. It was not an organized movement. Organized anti-Semitism comes from Le Pen, but he has stopped making anti-Semitic statements in public. He knows it is more advantageous for him to bash foreigners rather than Jews."

Jean-Jacques Fraenkel, a Holocaust survivor who divides his time between France and Canada, brings a dissenting voice to the debate on anti-Semitism. He is less than convinced that open anti-Semitism is on the wane.

"It's a French Catholic tradition to be anti-Semitic," said Fraenkel, whom the Nazis forced to wear a dreaded yellow star during the German occupation. Since 2001, he has received three anti-Semitic leaflets in his mailbox, and on the advice of friends, he tucks his Star of David chain inside his shirt.

It is impossible to ascertain whether Jews in France share Fraenkel's pessimistic outlook. But he certainly typifies a certain viewpoint, one formed on the red hot anvil of rejection and persecution.

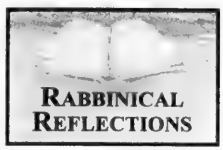
Jewish Life

We need a time and place to grieve

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN



As my friend and colleague, the late Rabbi Myer Schechter of the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal, once observed: "People truly do not understand the complex problems we rabbis encounter today. This is all the more the case in the hospital setting."

Indeed, as a rabbi and hospital chaplain, I sometimes long for the simple question, such as "How do I obtain kosher food in the hospital?" or "What do I do I do about lighting Shabbat candles in my room?"

Although I receive such questions, more often than not, these are not the questions for which a physician or a nurse calls me to a floor; these are not the situations that require the special intervention of the rabbi/chaplain.

I shall relate a case in point. In one of the hospitals where I provide service, a man was dying of cancer. His daughter was distraught. Her mother told her that when her father died, his remains would be cremated and his ashes scattered. There would be no funeral.

I gave this woman the opportunity to grieve her father's impending death and to express her anger at her mother. She said her relationship with her mother had always been strained, and she felt this latest disagreement was a culmination of her mother's ongoing rejection of her.

She asked me whether there was anything I, as a rabbi and chaplain, could do to help.

I proposed that after her father passed away, we could have a memorial service. The hospital maintained a non-denominational chapel, and this woman's husband, children and any friends she might wish to invite could attend the service with her there. She welcomed the suggestion.

The service took place the day after her father died. I conducted the service and recited several chapters from the Book of Psalms. Her husband delivered a eulogy, and I spoke to their young children about their good memories of their grandfather. I also suggested that this woman recite Kaddish in memory of her father, and she did so.

Several months later, the woman called and asked to meet with me. She said she needed a physical place where she could grieve for her father. I asked her what kind of space she was looking for. Did it have to be a place connected to his life? She said that would be best, if possible. I asked her if a room in the hospital would be acceptable. She said it would be, so I explored the possibility of finding an appropriate space there.

I found an unused office in a ward that had been closed. I asked for it to be cleaned up and made presentable. I suggested to the daughter that a ceremony be held there where she, her husband, and her children would place cherished objects from their father and grandfather – pictures of him, letters from him, even objects he had given them. She liked this idea, and such a ceremony did indeed take place.

From this woman's great-pain, I came to understand the insight of our tradition, which gives us both a place and a time for grief and mourning.

Perhaps this is another reason why Judaism disapproves of cremation. We know that we must inevitably lose the ones we love, but cremation is too violent a destruction of a body that once held a beloved parent or family member. Our wise and compassionate tradition understood this very well.

Rabbi Mark Friedman is a hospital chaplain for the Montreal Jewish community.

Are Jews trading shul for the couch?

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

In 1946, Reform Rabbi Joshua Liebman, in his best-selling Peace of Mind, pronounced that psychology had become as important to the spiritual lives of Americans as religion.

Although many in the religious world were unhappy at this comparison of the two domains, Rabbi Liebman's assertion has only grown in significance over the past 60 years, and the convergence of Judaism and psychological thought today can be seen as a potentially fruitful union in many ways. Despite Freud's classic formulations of religion as an "illusion" employed to fend off fundamental anxieties of death and meaninglessness – which created a deep-rooted mistrust of psychology in Orthodox Jewish circles – many schools of psychological thought have emerged that grant respect and importance to the spiritual life of patients.

Many Jews, whether or not they're religiously observant or strongly connected to Judaism, are flocking to therapy. It is there, in the safe haven of the therapeutic encounter (and, alas, not in our synagogues or with our religious leaders) that the really important issues people are desperately struggling with in their lives are being revealed – their spiritual dissatisfactions, romantic restlessness, family conflicts, and just plain existential turmoil.

Michelle Friedman, director of pastoral counselling at Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, writes: "People come to mental health treatment because they are in pain. The presentations of their pain vary – they come because they suffer from symptoms that restrict or threaten their lives, because they are struggling with inner conflicts that undermine or torment their integrity, or because if they don't come, they will lose their job, their spouse or their children."

Such a desire to alleviate pain and make more sense out of life is universal. Unlike the old quip, it's not just crazy people who go to a psychiatrist. Rather, the reverse is often true: a denial that one needs to pursue therapy can often prove to be utterly disastrous.

On Saturday night, Jan. 28, in Toronto, as part of a Torah in Motion conference on Judaism and Psychology, I will be discussing, with some of the top mental health professionals on the Jewish scene, why it is that people seek out therapy and what they hope to accomplish. Why do certain Orthodox Jews still stigmatize psychotherapy, such that their religious neighbours will not admit that they have sought therapeutic treatment? What is the proper relationship between the therapist and the rabbi? Do rabbis sometimes fancy themselves as therapeutically skilled, and then wade into complex emotional situations that are far beyond their purview? What is the line between healthy piety and dangerous pathology?

"Turn it over and turn it over, for everything is contained within it." If this Mishnah in Pirkei Avot is correct, then why can't contemporary Jews solve all their problems simply through Torah? Why are they turning to psychology? What are they telling their therapists about shidduchim (arranged marriages), about their religious strivings, about their secret hopes and failings? And how has therapy changed their lives forever?

Peace in the Middle East

Inheriting the Holy Land: An American's Search for Hope in the Middle East* by Jennifer Miller, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This is not a groundbreaking book about the Middle Eastern conflict, but it is a well written, helpful and welcome synthesis of history and reportage.

Jennifer Miller, during her six-month sojourn in Israel, was forced to confront her presuppositions and biases as an American, a Jew, a young woman and journalist. Her father, Aaron Miller, was a U.S. State Department negotiator at the Oslo and Camp David peace summits. The cause of a secure Israel is close to her heart.

Her real interest and experience with the complex interaction of Israelis and Palestinians began several years before she lived in Israel, when she joined the Seeds of Peace program, a privately funded project that brought young people from the Middle East to a summer camp in Maine for intensive sessions in problem resolution. Since 1993, the camp program has expanded to include other European and Asian countries. In 10 years, it has graduated almost 2,700 young adults.

It was an enlightening experience for her to be confronted with the views, opinions, fears, attitudes of Palestinians, Israelis, Jordanians and Egyptians. She soon discovered, however, that it was one thing to discuss controversial issues in the tranquil, almost idyllic, camp setting, but quite another to deal with the same teenagers on their own turf, where animosities festered, illusions were created and bloodshed was widespread.

A young Israeli complained to the author about the rampant corruption in the country's political system. Why did government officials put trivial or selfish concerns above the needs of constituents? She mentioned a news report about the problem of cellphones in Knesset meetings; the members were constantly answering them under the table during important discussions. "That's what matters to them?" she asked, incredulously. "My teachers say it's not right to answer your phone in the middle of a class. And the people in the Knesset were saying, 'I don't want to turn off my phone!' And these people are the leaders of my country?"

Everywhere in the West Bank and Gaza, the author discovered the high honour paid to suicide bombers. Miller writes: "The game of 'martyr' is popular among little kids; I once watched a Palestinian girl play dead as her sisters carried her by her arms and legs in a funeral procession around the house before finally depositing her into her 'grave,' the family-room sofa. In fact, anyone who dies by Israeli hands, whether he blows himself up or is hit by a stray bullet, is considered a martyr. To actively give up your life in fighting the occupation is the greatest honour of all."

Colin Powell, former U.S. Secretary of State, told the author in a frank interview that while the United States could not solve the conflict for Israelis and Palestinians, he firmly believed that an active U.S. role was crucial to helping these nations reconcile. No other country, he said, had enough influence with both parties to be an effective third-party broker. Moreover, Powell said it was irrelevant whether the American administration was headed by Democrats or Republicans. "The United States must get involved," he said.

Orthodox Rabbi Michael Melchior, a leading member of the Meimed Party in the Knesset, told Miller that in order for Israel to remain both Jewish and democratic, it had to separate from the Palestinians, even if it meant compromising on the value of Greater Israel. "I don't know any source in Judaism that puts the value of Greater Israel over the value of life," Melchior told me. "Those who are practising that value are distorting what Judaism is about."

This book ends on an optimistic note. The author is convinced that impetus for change is brewing on both sides of the conflict and that old regimes will give way in the future to more open and imaginative ones that will contribute to a new era of peace and reconciliation.

Jewish podcasts, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Whenever a new medium is developed to spread information, rabbis will find a way to use it to do some teaching. That's what happened with the printing press, the Internet, and now, with podcasts.

Last week, we began to listen in on podcasts, amateur radio shows that can be produced by practically anybody who has a microphone, a computer and something to say. Once you find one you like, you can download it and listen to it anytime you like and even copy them to an MP3 player like an iPod, so you can listen to them whenever you please.

Rabbi Zelig Pliskin has created four short, inspirational talks for Aish Hatorah's Podcast for Personal Growth. Rabbi Pliskin uses Jewish themes to explore contemporary issues such as finding the right way to point out faults in others and learning to deal with envy. In his podcast, the Joy of Taking Action, he tackles laziness. He asks why laziness is such a powerful force and quotes the 18th-century rabbi, the Vilna Gaon, who ties it to our need for comfort. Sure, "it's more comfortable to do nothing than to do something." But Rabbi Pliskin explains that it is far better to make goals for yourself and to accomplish things. "Do it with joy… the joy of being in control of the one person in life that you really can control… yourself." [http://tinyurl.com/ca6k3]

In The Shmuz, Rabbi B. Shafier also poses some profound and troubling questions. In Understanding Life Settings, he asks why "some people are blessed with success and others not?" He suggests that your temperament and your inner nature are inborn. They were given to you in the "ideal life setting" so that you can use them to grow and accomplish what you were put on the planet for. This, of course, is a difficult subject and not surprisingly, the rabbi takes a full hour to address it. Once done with that topic, you can listen to eight other podcasts from the rabbi. [www.theshmuz.com/]

Yonah Bookstein must be one of the more prolific rabbinic podcasters around. The campus rabbi at Hillel of Long Beach and West Orange County in California has put together sessions on the weekly Torah portion and the observance of mitzvahs. But he also isn't above using a trendy title in order to attract a crowd to his lectures or podcasts. "Madonna and Kabbalah" is a series of four lectures that actually debunks the trendiness of the modern movement and explains the authentic roots of Kabbalah. You can find links to all of this and more at the Guide to Rabbi Yonah's Podcast Jewniverse. Rabbi Yonah even sings in a couple of his podcasts. [http://tinyurl.com/78cz6]

Yiddish teacher helps kids understand heritage

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Marc Kates has come full circle. Lehrer Moishe (Teacher Marc), as his students call him, is a graduate of Bialik Hebrew Day School, the same school where he has been teaching for the past four years and one of the few where Yiddish is a compulsory subject.

A 30-year-old, fifth-generation Canadian on his mother's side, he has been involved in teaching Yiddish since he was a 16-year-old student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. At the time, he worked as a teaching assistant at Sunday morning Yiddish classes that were part of the North York Board of Education's heritage language program. Later, he taught adult Yiddish classes through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Committee for Yiddish.

Although Kates also teaches Grade 8 history and geography, and has a class with his homeroom students once a week where he deals with issues such as identity and friendship, there is no doubt that his classroom is Yiddish Central, with its pictures of Yiddish writers next to an "I (heart) Yiddish" T-shirt, a blackboard filled with Yiddish writing, and the back wall decorated with Yiddish sayings and their English translations.

A lesson from the teacher: "I tell my students, 'A bisl un a bisl vert a fulle shisl.' (A little and a little makes a full pot.) Little by little, their knowledge increases. Bit by bit, the bowl becomes full."

Kates attributes his love of Yiddish to two of his former Bialik teachers: Henia Reinhartz, now retired, and Ana Berman, who still teaches at the school. "They were the ones who turned me on to Yiddish."

He also credits Reinhartz for his Yiddish teaching philosophy, based on the idea of "instilling a spark in each child for the Yiddish culture, spirit and heritage... Hopefully that spark will grow into a roaring fire."

Recalling Reinhartz's words, Kates mused, "I thought that was beautifully said... that's [become] my philosophy as well."

He said he encourages his students to appreciate the language, and to use it to understand their heritage. Song, stories, dialogues and Yiddish film (for his Grade 8 class) all form part of his curriculum. "We do a lot of singing," he said.

Although Bialik has developed its own Yiddish curriculum over the years, Kates said he has "a lot of leeway" to introduce his own material. Last year, he wrote and directed the dramatization of a shtetl wedding, in which all three Grade 7 classes took part.

"It was a freilech [lively] evening," he said.

His own wedding last summer to Rachel Spitzer, the Toronto obstetrics and gynecology resident who delivered conjoined twins Tinotenda and Tenashe Mufuka in Zimbabwe last year, was a more low-key affair, he said.

The Grade 7 shtetl wedding, replete with Yiddish songs, was well received, and Kates is working on a repeat production, scheduled for next month.

"Through [the play], they learn what east European culture was about," he said.

"Zei shtill [be quiet]," he tells a class of Yiddish students, as they settle down to rehearse their lines for the shtetl wedding. As the class continues, he uses the script to weave in lessons about Yiddish and Judaism.

Kates honed his teaching philosophy and skills at UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education's Midrasha L'Morim, then during year-long stints at two other Jewish day schools before completing his B.Ed. at Brock University. He is currently working on his master's in education at York University, where he is doing a project on education in the shtetls of eastern Europe.

"It's a joy to come to work every morning," he said.

LEADERSHIP MISSIONS TO ISRAEL

FRIENDS OF SIMON WIESENTHAL CENTER FOR HOLOCAUST STUDIES

Center for Human Dignity
Museum of Tolerance Jerusalem

AN UNFORGETTABLE VISIT AT AN HISTORIC TIME

MARCH 6 - MARCH 15, 2006

An Invitation from Rabbi Marvin Hier

In March of 2006, the Simon Wiesenthal Center will launch its new International Leadership Missions to Israel Program, just a few weeks before the national elections for Prime Minister. I would like to invite you to join us.

As you know, these are critical times in the history of the Jewish people -- times to recommit to the two principal signposts of modern Jewish history: keeping the memory of the Holocaust alive by fighting antisemitism worldwide and building bridges for Jewish continuity by strengthening the State of Israel.

I can assure you that this will be an unforgettable opportunity to see Israel the way you would want to see her and the way you have never seen her before. You will explore the core challenges Israel must face in the future - the divide between the secular and the religious, between diverse ethnic groups and between Israel and her Arab neighbors. To hear from today and tomorrow's leaders and meet extraordinary people. To be moved to tears and laughter. To visit unbelievable sites including our Center for Human Dignity: Museum of Tolerance Jerusalem, designed by Frank O. Gehry and currently under construction.

Don't miss the opportunity of being on the Center's Inaugural Leadership Mission to Israel. This is the Israel you will never forget, the experience you will recount over and over to your family and friends.

This year in Jerusalem!

- Rabbi Marvin Hier

Hamas and Iran could upset Mideast apple cart

As of this writing, along with reports about the tragic death of Canadian diplomat Glyn Berry and the wounding of three Canadian soldiers in a suicide attack in Afghanistan, two other Middle East stories were making news: the chaos in the Palestinian Authority ahead of Jan. 25 elections and Iran's reckless pursuit of nuclear weapons.

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

In "Israel's Hamas Problem: The Danger Begins Next Door" (New York Times, Jan.15), Steven Erlanger wrote: "Israelis are watching with enormous concern the deterioration of the Palestinian Authority and its mainstay, the Fatah faction led by [PA President] Mahmoud Abbas, and the rise of Hamas, the radical Islamic group dedicated to Israel's destruction. A strong showing by Hamas, and such a showing is expected, would test Israel's ability even to talk about a final settlement with the Palestinians, or make any new pullback from the West Bank."

Erlanger noted that Abbas "has promised to move to dismantle the terrorist apparatus of Hamas and other groups once the Palestinian elections take place. That and a rejection of any military option against Israel constitute the major Palestinian obligation under the first stage of the road map." However, "few in Israel expect Mr. Abbas to deliver on his promise."

Erlanger interviewed Asher Susser, director of Tel Aviv University's Dayan Center, who said that while Hamas will complicate Israel's relations with the Palestinians, "[i]t's not like we had a deal wrapped up with Abbas and Hamas will stop it."

In the meantime, Susser "expects Israel's unilateral approach to continue" with Israel completing its security fence and taking further unilateral steps to disengage from the Palestinians.

How much instability there will be after the PA elections remains an open question. What is clear is that internecine violence is taking a high toll on Palestinians. In a London Times article reprinted in the Ottawa Citizen ("Gaza factions chase peace away," Jan. 14), Stephen Farrell cited Tawfiq Abu Khoussa, a spokesperson for the ministry of interior, who confirmed that in 2005, more Palestinians were killed "by internal feuds" than by Israeli forces.

Meanwhile, some journalists are floating the "pragmatic" Hamas theory, in which the so-called moderate wing of Hamas will act as a counter to the hardliners who reject negotiating with Israel.

To many Israelis, this is reminiscent of the naïve Western thinking that believed in a split between pragmatists and radicals in Iran. This division proved illusory. The hardliners continue in power today and – it is widely assumed – are developing nuclear weapons.

While Iran has threatened to "wipe Israel off the map," its nuclear program is also a threat to the immediate security of the Gulf's oil rich emirates, a longer-term threat to Europe, and a major test of international resolve.

On Jan. 15, the Montreal Gazette reprinted Thomas Friedman's New York Times article "Axis of Order," which, in stark terms, discusses how the world must deal with Iran's nuclear ambitions. If Iran is allowed to go nuclear, he warned, "[t]he structure of the whole post-Cold-War world is at stake."

Friedman calls on Russia, China and India to take the lead in diffusing the crisis now that their economies are growing and they are becoming major stakeholders in maintaining world order (in addition to having major business dealings with Tehran). He asks them to become the "Axis of Order" and assist the old western powers in dealing with Iran's threat.

Economic sanctions may be part of the answer. In the Jan. 17 National Post, a Reuters report ("Russia, West draw closer on Iran action") said that Britain, France and Germany have drafted a resolution to be brought to the UN Security Council to impose possible sanctions on Iran for continued violations of its obligations under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. However, two major parties, both with veto capacity, are resisting this move – Russia and China.

In the final analysis, several analysts warn, nothing short of military action or its serious threat will deter Iran.

Our sacred duty to aid the oppressed

By JOSH SCHEINERT

Guest Voice

On Friday, Jan. 27, for the first time, the world will hold an International Day of Commemoration for the victims of the Holocaust. And while this may be a milestone for Jews and sensible action on the part of the global community, we cannot take full comfort in this measure. At this stage, we are only achieving half of what such a day entails.

Zachor, remembrance, means more than just the act of remembering. It also encompasses a proactive measure.

The second part of the UN resolution proclaiming this day calls for "member states to develop educational programs that will inculcate future generations with the lessons of the Holocaust in order to help prevent future acts of genocide." This phrase, restating the sentiment of "never again," highlights where we have fallen terribly short.

As Jews, we have a special responsibility to lead the world in this mission. It is our noble opportunity to fulfil the words of God, who in Isaiah 42:6 commands us to be "or la govim," a light unto the nations. Thus, when injustice, persecution and murder are taken up, on any scale, it is our sacred duty to come to the aid of those oppressed. We have to do for others what very few did for us.

Today, that verse from Isaiah calls to us with increasing urgency. Half a world away, in a remote corner of Africa that far too few of us have heard about, one of the greatest crimes against humanity since the Shoah is taking place. For some reason, the world has been unable, or unwilling, to confront this conflict in a manner that actively seeks to end it.

In Darfur, a region the size of France in the western Sudan, government-backed Arab militias, janjaweed, are carrying out campaigns to murder, rape and destroy the livelihood of millions of black Africans. The best estimates put the number killed since the conflict's inception in March 2003 at 200,000 to 400,000, with more than two million displaced persons, hundreds of thousands in UN refugee camps in neighbouring Chad, and countless others out of reach to humanitarian workers because the situation is too dangerous.

As a community, we need to raise our voices, together, in a call for the world to do more. We need to pressure our government to take a proactive role in working with the United Nations and African Union to help end the conflict. We should be demanding the Sudanese embassy in Ottawa to account for its government's actions. Let us bombard them with e-mails to show them that we will not rest until the situation is resolved (sudan embassy-canada@rogers.com).

Together, let us show our country that as Jews we cannot and will not sit idly by in a world where injustice reigns freely. Let it be known that in every synagogue, day school and community organization Jews are coming together to act on behalf of the people in Darfur. And on this International Day of Commemoration, 61 years after our relatives walked freely from the horrors of Auschwitz, let us remember that sacred oath we all swore, that never again would we allow the world to unleash an evil of such magnitude. Only then will we be fulfilling the true meaning of Zachor.

Remember the Romanian Kristallnacht

By BARUCH COHEN

I was 21 years old. I was there. I am a witness.

The pogrom in Bucharest on Jan. 21, 1942, took the lives of 130 Jews. Gangs of Iron Guard Legionaries looted hundreds of Jewish homes and dragged their inhabitants away, and beat, tortured and killed them. They demolished and burned to the ground hundreds of Jewish stores. They desecrated and torched 25 synagogues, including the majestic ancient Spanish and Portuguese temple, and destroyed Torah scrolls.

These are the images I live with to this day. The Iron Guard criminals looted and devastated the Jewish neighbourhood of Bucharest during the three days of Romania's terrible, but seldom mentioned, "Kristallnacht," which took place from Jan. 21 to 23, 1941. They took away innocent people from their homes, their workplaces and places of worship, killed them and hung them, like cattle, from hooks in slaughterhouses with tags reading "kosher meat."

Guest Voice

Emil Dorian, another witness of the Romanian Kristallnacht, recalls the devastation in his memoir The Quality of Witness: A Romanian Diary, 1937-1944. "What happened in Vacaresti, Dudesti [Jewish areas] and surrounding neighbourhoods remains indescribable. Suffice it to list the destruction, the looting and the bestial crimes. But even that is impossible. The fury of the looters has not spared anybody or anything. Shop after shop with shutters wrenched off their hinges, windows smashed, walls burned, rooms emptied made it impossible to guess what had been seen before," Dorian wrote.

"The great beautiful Sephardi synagogue has been completely destroyed. They set [it] on fire with cans of gasoline placed in four corners, and looters danced by the flames. The list of beaten and tortured people is endless, and crimes cover the complete range of a demented imagination, Jews forced to drink gasoline with Epsom salts, crosses cut on the skin of their backs, torture and killing, on and on…"

The chief rabbi of Romania at the time, Alexander Safran, wrote in his memoirs: "During these days, the Iron Guard Legionaries also occupied the Malbim Beith Hamidrash [synagogue] and tortured many Jews there. They killed the cantor of the Coral Temple while he was conducting the Minchah services. They also killed Jews who had come there to say Kaddish. Dozens of Jews were first tortured and transported to the Jilava forest. All men were shot."

In his recent book, Radu Ioanid writes: "Severe beatings and other forms of humiliation usually preceded the murders, and indeed it was the physical abuse that constituted the favoured medium by which the legionaries and their friends expressed their aptitudes. Many Jews were abused at the Bucharest prefecture of police. The women were, by and large, released after physical abuse, which explains the small number of women's names that appears on the list of murdered victims."

Today, Romania has finally acknowledged its atrocities during the Holocaust years of 1940 to '44 and its government has promised to ensure that the Holocaust will be taught in high schools and universities. However, Holocaust education in Romania is said to be optional. It should be mandatory, and taught as an integral part of Romania's history.

Before World War II, some 800,000 Jews lived in Romania. They were a community proud of their contribution to all fields of Romanian society. Today, a mere 6,000 to 8,000 elderly Romanian Jews live in the country. They are well taken care of, receiving financial help, not from the Romanian government, but from Canadian and American Jewish communities.

Despite the promises made by former Romanian president Ion Iliescu and current Romanian President Traian Basescu after acknowledging the Holocaust, almost nothing has changed in Romania. Reparations for the confiscation and theft of Jewish properties during the Holocaust era have not been made, and Romanian politicians still have not made a firm commitment to Holocaust education.

In 2004, Iliescu rewarded two known Holocaust deniers and anti-Semites, Corneliu Vadim Tudor and Ghorghe Buzatu, with the country's highest medal of honour.

Today, there are still reports of vandalism and desecration of synagogues and Jewish cemeteries in Romania. There are also reports of graffiti denying the Holocaust, and anti-Semitic books and books that contain anti-Semitic statements are released by the state-owned publisher. In the private media, without objection or interference from the government, anti-Semitism exists.

Baruch Cohen, a Holocaust survivor, is the research chair of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research.

Journal gives young Jews and Arabs a voice

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Can a journal about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict ever be apolitical?

Meena Rafie, an Afghani-born Muslim, and Ran Goel, an Israeli-born Jew, believe it's possible.

"We like to think of it as a non-ideological, apolitical journal," said Rafie, a fourth-year political science and urban studies major at the University of Toronto and the executive producer of Yalla, a student-run literary journal about the Middle East conflict.

Despite the number of people who have called them naive, both Rafie and Goel are determined to prove the doubters wrong.

"We're not here to negotiate a political settlement, but we can reach out to people who would not bother listening to the other side," said Goel, a second-year law student at U of T and a senior editor of Yalla.

"We don't pretend that if we just talk to each other then everything will be fine, but we do think that if we don't talk to each other then everything will definitely not be fine," he added.

Yalla, which means "let's go" in Arabic, was created last year by six Jewish and Arab students at McGill University as a forum for poetry, short stories, personal accounts, photography and academic essays by Canadian Arabs and Jews, ages 18 to 30, that "display a diversity of opinion" on the conflict.

Rafie, the co-chair of the Jewish and Muslim Student's Association at U of T, first became involved in the project when Dalia Rotstein, one of the former editors who spearheaded the first edition of the journal, asked her to help launch the publication at U of T.

Rotstein also commissioned the help of Goel, whom she had met in Israel when the two of them interned for the same Knesset member.

The free journal is now based largely at U of T and has eight editors – four in Toronto and four in Montreal.

Hillel helps distribute the journal at Canadian campuses as far away as Calgary and Vancouver, and Yalla has received funding from U of T's faculty of law and its Students' Administrative Council, among other sources.

With the second edition scheduled to come out in March, Rafie and Goel are seeking anyone with an opinion on the Mideast conflict to contribute. Rafie expects the new issue will be 250 pages long.

"We want to reach beyond to get people who wouldn't otherwise contribute, to contribute," Goel said.

While the editors and producers put very few restrictions on submissions, Rafie said pieces that incite violence or hatred will not be tolerated.

Rafie recalled the feedback she received from people at the journal's launch party who said that reading it was an eyeopener.

"People approached us, both Israelis and Arabs, and said, 'I had no idea that this land means as much to them as it does to us.'"

Although Rafie and Goel are encouraged by the positive feedback, they know there are people who hope the journal fails.

"Some people see it as legitimizing the other side's faults," Goel said.

"Many groups from both sides have discouraged this type of dialogue for fear that it denies their human rights by giving voice and space to their counterparts' views. Our purpose is to empower the voice of the people, both Jewish and Arab, to express how the conflict affects them personally," Rafie said.

She added that each viewpoint is valid, and the journal offers everyone a voice.

"To negate Yalla because it attempts to humanize the other is to stay locked in the unproductive rhetoric which has characterized the conflict from day one," Rafie said.

For more information or to contribute, e-mail yallajournal@yahoo.ca. Deadline for submissions is Feb. 20.

Art show encourages Jewish artists to find themselves

By KYLE GORDON
CJN Intern

Young Jewish artists on a journey to learn more about themselves have a supportive environment in which to showcase their art at the annual Jewish students' art show.

The exhibition, Jan. 18 to 29, is "an avenue for people to explore their Jewish identity and meet other people who are thinking about their identity," said Daniel Abramson, arts and culture co-ordinator for Hillel of Greater Toronto.

The title of the show, "Lech Lecha – Find Yourself," emerged from a text study discussion about identity and the journey of Abraham after he was commanded to leave his home. It was by leaving his nation, community and family that Abraham discovered his own true identity, Abramson said.

"This fit really well in terms of the arts stuff. We are all trying to explore our own identity through our work," he said. The art show is an opportunity for young Jewish artists to express themselves in a forum where they do not feel alone.

Ricky Tollman, 20, is taking his art out of his bedroom and into the public eye for the first time.

"I don't normally like people to see my art, so we'll see how it goes," Tollman said of the three paintings and two cartoons that are on sale at the show.

"This show is also important because most of the people submitting their work are not associated with Hillel or with the Jewish community. This is their chance to get involved," said Melaine Cheskes, 20, an artist who helped organize the exhibit.

Pearl Hirsh, 21, admits that she has never participated in a Hillel event, but the theme of the art show – find yourself – really resonated with her.

Hirsh's photograph of a glass of kosher wine and a birth control pill, a favourite from her 12-piece series called The Chosen Girls, is one of the works on display. The series explores Jewish female sexuality and the various ways gender and "girlness" are created and maintained in today's culture, Hirsh said.

"I'm very excited. It's exhilarating to have other people appreciate my work… I feel like for the first time in my life I have original ideas and insight. It's great," she said.

"I'm just beginning my journey as an artist. I'd like to continue to explore these ideas and rethink and reshape what I have to say about my Jewish culture."

In addition to showcasing the work of 10 talented student artists, the show at the Propeller Centre for Visual Arts, 984 Queen St. W., will hold a silent auction on the evening of Jan. 26. The auction will feature the work of professional Jewish artists from Toronto. The goal is to raise enough money to send one child to Camp Koby in Israel.

The Koby Mandell Foundation was created in memory of Sherri and Rabbi Seth Mandell's 13-year-old son Koby. He and his friend were stoned to death by Arab terrorists in a cave near their home in Tekoa, Israel.

Camp Koby was established to provide children of families struck by terror with a place where others understand. The welcoming environment allows these children to begin the healing process while engaging in fun programs like art, music and sports.

CFJS sends delegation to world student congress

By ROBERT METH
Special to The CJN

The Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) sent five delegates to the annual World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS) congress, held recently in Zichron Yaakov, Israel.

The students – Gary Diamond from the University of Western Ontario, Emily Sufrin from the University of British Columbia, Samuel Zeev Konig from McGill University, Hagai Kuperman from the University of Toronto and myself, from Ryerson University – spent five days networking, learning and socializing with other Jewish students from across the world.

The trip, which was subsidized by National Jewish Campus Life, was an opportunity for Canadian students to hear what Jewish students in other countries experience, while at the same time sharing some successful Canadian initiatives.

Initiatives such as CFJS' annual conference, STAND Canada, and our political involvement, are some of the ways in which Canadian Jewish students are contributing to the greater community and empowering students.

These initiatives were discussed throughout the conference, which took place from Dec. 28, 2005, to Jan. 2, 2006, and showcased during a fair in which students from each attending country set up a display that showed their accomplishments.

The conference included workshops and meetings to help students learn from one another and encourage international co-operation among Jewish students from different countries.

The CFJS delegation met and listened to Knesset member Rabbi Michael Melchior and former Winnipeg Zionist Initiative shaliach Jonny Cline, who is WUJS' new executive director, speak at the conference.

Students visited the town of Zichron Yaakov, a winery, Haifa University and a school.

"It was very important for us to attend this congress and to be able to showcase our accomplishments here in Canada. We have achieved a tremendous amount over the last two years, but we continue to strive for more as we continue to enhance Jewish campus life," says Diamond, who is president of the CFJS.

Kuperman, chair of the U of T Hillel, says, "I learned many valuable lessons at the congress that I will now be able to take back to my campus and apply. The experience was truly worth it."

Three generations have found success as Jewish farmers

By WILF GEROFSKY
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — A third generation member of a Jewish family who came to Canada just prior to World War II is now helping run an internationally recognized dairy farm in Southern Ontario.

The family-owned farm, called Summitholm Holsteins, is an efficient and respected model for dairy farmers and Holstein breeders around the globe. It was established 59 years ago by a young couple, Joe and Minna Loewith, who had escaped with their families from the Sudetenland area of Czechoslovakia just before the Nazis invaded their homeland.

Today, two of Minna and Joe's sons, Carl and David Loewith, run the farm, and a third generation has followed in their footsteps, as Carl's son, Ben, has joined his father and uncle in the business.

The Loewiths offer some statistics that give an idea of the scope of their operation. They produce enough milk each day to last an average family 13 years, a total of four million litres a year. Their barn houses 350 cows, about 300 of which are milked three times a day for a per capita production of 40 litres per day – the Ontario average is 30 litres.

The farm now covers about 800 acres, of which 550 are owned and 250 rented, all dedicated to producing cattle feed. Cows are bred once a year, and some days, four or five are calving at the same time. Carl, David and Ben run the entire operation with the help of only one full-time employee and a few part-timers.

Joe and Minna Loewith's story is a familiar one. Their families left Czechoslovakia in 1939, just a step ahead of Hitler's invading army after Joe, who spoke German, saw a notice sent by the Nazis to the local police. Thirty-two members of Minna's family left on the last commercial flight out of Prague, and seven others, including Joe, chartered a plane. They all ultimately sailed from Liverpool, and came to Canada to take advantage of the country's immigration policy, which required that they spend five years working the land.

Joe, who had been a textile salesman in Europe, started his agricultural career as a farmhand earning $5 a month plus room and board. Minna, who was then 15, worked after school as a soda jerk at Woolworth's in downtown Hamilton. They married in 1942 when she was 20 and he was 32. Five years later, they bought a dairy farm in Copetown from Joe's sister and brother-in-law. The farmhouse was built in 1857.

"It was muddy and primitive, and I said, 'I'll never live there!'" says Minna, who had been accustomed to a more luxurious lifestyle at home, but it was all they could afford.

Under their care, it became the model farm where she lived with her beloved Joe all his life, and where her children, grandchildren and now great-grandchildren have grown up.

Joe died in 1998. He loved his animals and believed they never let him down as humans might do. He used to say, "If there is a heaven, this must be it."

Looking back, Minna recalls a wonderful life, with healthy children, and never feeling sorry for herself. "I loved it. I'd do it all over again."

Carl and David are in great demand all over the world to speak on their methods. They have spoken in more than 20 different countries including Germany, Russia, Mexico, China and Japan. David was honoured as the outstanding young farmer of Canada in 1991, and both have held executive positions in many farm organizations. During last fall's Royal Winter Fair in Toronto, several hundred visitors from as far away as India and Saudi Arabia were bused to the farm to observe its system.

David says Israel has the record for the highest production of milk per cow and has developed much of the equipment and technology used on dairy farms everywhere, including Summitholm.

The family gets up every morning at 4:15 a.m. to work and manage the huge operation, but have still found time to be involved in the Jewish community. Carl has been president of Temple Anshe Sholom, Shalom Village for seniors, and the Dundas Rotary Club. David has also been president of Temple Anshe Sholom.

David and his wife, Bonnie, whom he met on a Young Zionist trip to Israel, have also co-chaired the JNF campaign, and she has been president of the UJA Federation in Hamilton. She received her MD from McMaster Medical School in 1984, while raising their children. She has a busy practice in Ancaster and sits on the Shalom Village Board and its medical advisory committee.

The Loewith family were the honorees at the 1999 Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner.

FASHIONS FROM ISRAEL: Fashions designed by students of Na'amat technological schools in Israel were recently modelled by Na'amat Canada's Toronto teenage chapter, Club Vered. Na'amat operates 20 technological high schools in Israel. Each year, the schools give a second chance to thousands of students who did not succeed in the mainstream educational system. Club Vered models are, from left, Elise Nusbaum, Karen Kerzman, Amanda Benatar, Tali Rosenberg, Emily Bolton, Remi Milchin, Frances Weig and Chay Kerbal.

Community volunteer Lily Barr showed genuine interest in people

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

No matter where she was, be it the humble confines of an elevator or the grandeur of the Israeli consulate, Lily Barr took a genuine interest in all the people with whom she crossed paths.

"One of her real pet peeves was when people say 'How are you?' and don't really mean it," said Eli Barr, Lily's son.

"She wouldn't just say 'How are you?' She would stop and have a conversation with anyone, and I think it meant a lot to these people, because you always feel good when someone is really interested in you."

The former president of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation (CICF) and an active volunteer at Baycrest died Jan. 12 after a battle with lung cancer and pneumonia.

She is survived by Eli, his wife Sandy and grandchildren Jonathan, Josh, and Laurel. Her husband David predeceased her.

Born in Riga, Latvia in 1924, Barr was raised by staunch Zionists.

"Her father was really excited by [Theodor] Herzl and what was happening in Palestine," Eli Barr said.

"In the 1930s, he travelled to Palestine many times and bought property in Tel Aviv."

The real estate investment turned out to be prescient, as the deteriorating situation in Latvia during World War II prompted the family to move to Palestine in 1941.

They likely would not have survived if they remained, as many family members perished.

"She said the train leaving Riga was probably the saddest she ever was in her entire life," Barr said.

"Because she was spared, it was important for her to enjoy life and live it in honour of her family."

She served as an officer in the Haganah during Israel's War of Independence and tended to sick and wounded soldiers who were hospitalized.

Lily married David Barr (formerly Berman), a sixth generation Sabra whose family owned a famous bakery in Jerusalem.

A lawyer who earned one of his degrees from the American University in Beirut, David Barr became an Israeli diplomat and was sent with his wife to Argentina in 1961, the year Nazi Adolf Eichmann was captured in that country by Israeli intelligence.

A few years later, the Barrs moved to New York City, where Lily's ability to engage people proved invaluable while she worked for the Israeli consulate and the United Nations, under the leadership of then ambassador Abba Eban.

"She worked for Abba Eban during the Six Day War and claimed to be the first civilian who found out about the war outside of Israel," said Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec Congregation, who delivered the eulogy at Barr's funeral.

"She went through all the drama that took place in the UN at that time."

In the mid-1970s, David took on the new job of representing the Israeli Discount Bank in Toronto.

In her new city, Lily became actively involved in the Jewish community, dedicating her time to causes she believed in, such as promoting Israeli artists as president CICF and volunteering with Hadassah WIZO.

Even as she got older, Barr didn't slow down her community work, becoming a regular face among the volunteers in Baycrest's psychology department.

"People looked at her and thought she was in her 60s," Barr relates.

"She was just full of life."

Barr's memory stayed sharp and many people marvelled at how she didn't forget their names.

"If you asked her what happened at Hadassah Hospital in 1948, she could remember people by name," Rabbi Tanenbaum said.

"Because she had this kind of personality, it helped her husband David, because as a diplomat, they met many people, and her style matched his needs."

Three years ago, Barr returned to Latvia to retrace her roots and visit the spot believed to be where family members were murdered.

"She had always felt emptiness in herself, and this was real closure," Barr said.

Israel plans on opening Montreal tourism office

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Israel plans to open a tourism office in Montreal this spring, conditional upon the Israeli cabinet's adoption of its budget, says Dani Shahal, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) in Toronto.

Shahal said that if the cabinet approves the budget at the end of this month, the Montreal office could open in March or April. The initiative has been approved in principle by the tourism ministry, he added.

The IGTO has not had an office in Montreal for about 27 years, he said.

Shahal, who has been IGTO director since October, 2001, believes Israel could attract far more tourists from Quebec – both Jewish and non-Jewish – if the IGTO had a representative in Montreal. He believes there is a "huge potential" market among the non-Jewish population that Israel is not tapping into.

Shahal said his preference is to locate the Montreal office downtown, separate from the Israeli consulate, and to have it run by a Canadian.

The IGTO estimates that 7,000 to 8,000 Quebecers visited Israel in 2005, about 70 per cent of them Jewish. Approximately 50,000 Canadians in total visited Israel last year, of whom 60 per cent were Jewish, Shahal said. That's up from 42,000 in 2004. The IGTO is projecting 58,000 Canadians will visit Israel this year.

As it has elsewhere in Canada, tourism to Israel from Quebec fell after the start of the second intifadah in 2000 but has started to recover. The IGTO believes up to 9,000 people from Quebec were going to Israel per year just before the violence began.

In addition, tourism from Quebec was hurt by Air Canada's cancellation of its twice-weekly direct flights between Montreal and Tel Aviv at the end of 2000, Shahal said. He said he is trying to persuade the carrier to restore that service.

Israel's national airline, El Al, stopped its flights out of Montreal in the late 1990s. Shahal does not believe that will change.

He believes the IGTO should be making a greater effort in Quebec to market Israel as a tourist destination, as well as a destination of religious significance to Christians and Jews. In 2006, he expects that non-Jews will represent a larger proportion of the Quebec tourists.

Shahal said 400 Canadian religious groups are already confirmed to tour Israel in 2006, and almost 90 of those are from Quebec. He said that greater ease of movement between Jerusalem and Bethlehem, with the relaxing of security checks, has led to an upsurge in Christian pilgrims from around the world.

The IGTO also plans to more vigorously promote tourism in the Montreal Jewish community, including asking rabbis to impress upon their congregants the importance of going to Israel.

The renewed interest in Quebec by Israel is a major turnaround from only four years ago, when Israel was about to close its consulate in Montreal, and only relented after pressure from Jewish community leaders.

Raymond James U.S. Analysts' Best Picks for Canadian Investors

In this market, the right picks can be especially important. The U.S. Best Picks highlights individual stocks while giving investors a group of companies expected to produce superior overall results during the upcoming year. It is comprised of stocks in which the covering analyst has particularly strong convictions.

This year will mark the 10th year of the U.S. Analysts' Best Picks and since its inception it has dramatically outperformed the S&P 500 as outlined in the table opposite. However, it is prudent to remind investors that past performance is no guarantee of future results.

Since 1996 a total of 109 stocks have been recommended through the US Analysts' Best Picks list. Of this total 79 advanced (72.5%) and 30 declined (27.5%) within the recommended holding period. The holding period for each year's list is approximately 55 weeks from the inception date to 12/31 of the following year. Past performance is not indicative of future results. An investor would incur commissions to transact these recommendations. Individual results will vary and transaction costs related to investing in these stocks will affect overall performance. The market value of securities fluctuates and investors may incur profits or losses. The performance returns in 1999 were extraordinary and it is unlikely that these unrealistically high returns will be repeated.

Corey Mandell is back at Timberlane

Barry and Philomena Lowes founded Camp Timberlane in 1957. For two generations, it's been a place where kids have fun vacations, master new skills, make lifelong friendships, and learn respect for nature.

Corey Mandell and Timberlane go back a long way. He started there as a camper aged nine, in 1979. By 18, he was doing a lot of DJ-ing, much of it for the camp. When he founded Mandell Entertainment as a bar mitzvah company in 1990, much of his work came from Timberlane.

He ran Mandell Entertainment's bar mitzvah division personally, till he sold it in 2005. (He still owns Mandell Entertainment, which does corporate events.) In summer 2005, he returned to Timberlane as director.

When the Lowes retired in September, he bought the camp, with the Lowes still involved as founding directors. So now he's come full circle.

"Last summer," Mandell says, "was our best ever. Ninety per cent of our campers were returnees, and people brought in by word of mouth."

Camp Timberlane has its own lake, Lake of Two Islands. Fed by underwater springs, it's among the purest lakes in the Haliburton Highlands.

Timberlane is a wilderness camp, with traditional activities like campfires and singsongs. For today's sophisticated kids, there's a range of new attractions and a varied arts program.

Camp Timberlane offers sports from kayaking to rock climbing and BMX biking. It's also one of the few Ontario camps to offer scuba diving with PADI certification. And on special hiking trips, campers learn to respect the environment, and acquire basic survival skills.

Visual arts range from copper enamelling to digital photography. The musical program features plays like Cats and Les Mis; and there's a dance program.

Timberlane is co-ed, ages seven to 16. Girls and boys sleep in separate camps, with the common area between them. There are places for 200 boys and 200 girls, with one staff member for every two campers.

Campers are mainly, but not exclusively Jewish. Friday evening, there's a Shabbat dinner and service.

Staff respect each child's needs and abilities; no "templates" here. Every camper is an individual.

Ask for Corey Mandell at 416-733-0044, ext. 224. And visit the website: www.camptimberlane.ca

Another exciting year at Camp B'nai Brith Ottawa

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is a privately owned overnight camp located in the foothills of the Gatineaus, 45 minutes outside of Ottawa. We have a long and successful camping history of well over 60 years. Our camp prides itself in welcoming children from all over the world. Although we are a private Ottawa camp we treasure our many campers from Montreal, Toronto, New York, Florida, Israel and even the Caribbean.

Camp B'nai Brith has a varied program to stimulate children with many different interests. We offer an extensive number of different programs such as drama, arts & crafts, dance, tennis, basketball, miniature golf, all camp programs (Grey Cup/Super Bowl, World Cup, Colour War, etc.) and tremendous camp spirit. Our waterfront overlooking the Ottawa River has a sandy beach which is home to our vast watersports. They include waterskiing, windsurfing, knee-boarding, kayaking, canoeing, sailing and a Catamaran. Our Olympic size heated pool allows campers to enjoy swimming away from the hub of activities at the beach. Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is very proud of our extremely successful Red Cross aquaquest program which offers all levels of instruction up to and including Bronze Cross.

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa offers a kosher kitchen (Ottawa VAAD Kashruth) and is also a PEANUT SENSITIVE camp. In addition, we offer a Judaica program which is fun but yet traditional. This includes weekly Shabbat services. We also have an indoor gym, dance studio,recreation hall and an on-site infirmary which has a fully qualified medical staff.

One area we are most sensitive to is the anxiety of our younger campers coming to camp for the first time. To ease this situation we have instituted a very successful program. We offer our 2 wk. starter camp for new C.B.B. campers aged 7-12.

If you are interested in giving your child an active, stimulating and exciting summer camp experience, then Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is the place to be. For more information please call Keith Mason at 613-224-7445.

Girls from Around the World to Experience Israel with Chavayot International

Chasya has spent several Pesach vacations touring Israel, so she expects more than the regular tourist sites out of her summer in Israel. After carefully evaluating her options for summer programs in Israel, Chasya, 15, chose Chavayot.

"More than a chance to make friends with girls from everywhere - like England and Australia -- which was important to me, I chose Chavayot because I wanted a trip where I could have fun and grow from the experience at the same time," said Chasya.

Chasya's uncle, Tzvi, saw Chavayot's banner ad on Arutz Sheva's website and forwarded it to her. The website - www.chavayot.com - explained everything in detail. Chavayot offers a six-week adventure in Israel for girls 12-17. "It seemed like the right adventure for Chasya," said Tzvi. "She's the kind of girl that likes jeeping, zip-lining, hiking. I'm sure she will love snorkeling in Eilat"

But it was the attention to detail that won Chasya's mother, Devora, over. "Before I send my daughter to Israel, I want to know she's in good hands." Chavayot travels with IDF-trained security guards at all times. Meals are prepared to be delicious and nutritious - hotel style. Doctors visit each week. Buses are new and comfortable.

Luxurious hotels in excellent locations are already booked. There's even weekly laundry service to keep the girls' clothing fresh and clean. "The director is a mother of four, an educator with fifteen years of experience leading teens. That's who I want taking my daughter through Israel."

Chavayot International is planned with the mindset of today's teenage girl in mind. "Chavayot takes the amazing fun of Eretz Yisroel and puts it in context," said Chavayot Director Chana Leah Schochet. "Chavayot's adventure is structured to enable the girls to discover their inner strengths by experiencing the power of Eretz Yisroel's sites, history, activities and its most fascinating people."

Whether its meeting the couple behind "Ushpizin," spending Shabbat with Rabbi Zev Leff of Moshav Modi'in, exploring with renowned guides Rabbi Asher Wade and Rabbi Simcha Hochbaum, speaking with Neveh Yerushalayim's Rebbetzin Tzipporah Heller, girls on Chavayot are set to experience a summer like nothing else.

Check out www.chavayot.com - get a glimpse of all Chavayot has to offer. The application is online. Receive Chavayot's information kit by calling 718-363-5089 or 917-753-9668.

CAMP EXPERTS & TEEN SUMMERS

How great it is when kid and camp match up! If your child, say, an outdoor sports enthusiast, goes to the right camp, they'll bring back memories that sustain him through a long winter when playing fields are deep in snow. But the wrong place, where sports are an afterthought, could sour him on camps for good.

It's vital to make the right match -- whether it's sports or science, art or computers that turn your son or daughter on. For kids 7 - 18, call The Camp Experts & Teen Summers. They visit and research about 150 camps a year, of all different kinds, and can give you the best advice. Their world-wide research includes over 800 programs, internships, community service, and language program, adventure & so much more.

"Camps extend the learning process," says Joanne Paltrowitz, the owner/ director of The Camp Experts. "They enable children to get better at things they like, and learn independence and co-operation, while enjoying themselves in a relaxed atmosphere.

"We have many repeat clientele," says Paltrowitz. "We love what we do, and tailor our recommendations to individual children and parents." The service is free.

URJ Camp George: Blending the Best of Ontario Camping with the Best of Jewish Camping

Situated on the beautiful shores of Maple Lake, two hours north of Toronto, Camp George is one of 12 residential camps in North America owned and operated by the Union for Reform Judaism. Camp George – co-educational, for campers currently in Grades 2-10 – blends the best of Ontario camping with the best of Jewish camping.

Overnight camping provides both the opportunities and the nurturing environment that fosters the personal, social and physical development of campers and staff. Overnight camp fosters independence, builds self-esteem, enhances one's appreciation of the natural surroundings, and enables one to develop important individual and team physical and social skills.

The overall goal of the Union for Reform Judaism camping system is the development of a knowledgeable and Jewishly literate community for the future. Through the years, URJ Camps such as Camp George have helped thousands of campers and staff achieve development goals while also being effective complements to spiritual and congregational life, religious school, youth activities, and teacher education. Camp George provides positive frameworks within which Judaism is celebrated, compelling communities are built, and leadership and commitment is developed.

Activity Highlights Include: waterskiing, sailing, canoeing, kayaking, swimming, outward bound, mountain bikes, ropes, two climbing walls, a giant swing, tennis, soccer, basketball, softball, beach volleyball, ultimate frisbee, drama, arts and crafts, dance, pottery, photography, and more!

Avenue Road Arts School

Founded in 1993, the Avenue Road Arts School provides people of all ages with high-quality visual and performing arts programs in a relaxed and supportive environment. The school is committed to fostering imaginative thinking and developing transferable skills. It has created an innovative roster of programming for both children and adults.

March Break and Summer Camps offer fun, engaging and creative ways to spend a vacation. Children from 4 to 9 attend theme-based camps centered on visual arts and drama, while the 10 to 14 year-old set have a choice of programs in pottery, painting, cartooning or drama. The curriculum ensures a wide selection for all tastes and ages. Professional artist/instructors introduce their students to new techniques and concepts and inspire them to 'think differently'. Small class sizes allow for plenty of individual attention.

Recognized as a leader in arts education, Kids Can Press commissioned the school to create The Jumbo Book of Art, a collection of art projects developed by the faculty. It won the prestigious Disney Adventures Magazine Annual Book Awards Contest and has now sold more than 40,000 copies internationally. A second book is in the works – this one entitled The Jumbo Book of Outdoor Art.

Stimulate your child to think with imagination at a young age.
The practice will last for a lifetime.

Canada's Premier Golf Camp

Par Golf Camps is now entering its 14th fabulous summer as Canada's premier golf instruction organization.

Instruction is provided for beginners, intermediate and advanced golfers all under the auspices of Joshua Cooper, golf professional and coach of the Maccabi Youth Golf Team. Campers are picked up at home and brought to the campsite, an 18 hole golf course with a driving range, short game area and indoor facilities. Therefore, there is no busing throughout the day as all activities are held at the same location.

Children are placed in select groups based on their age and ability. The daily routine focuses on different aspects of golf. Campers play nine holes twice a week throughout their two week session. One month and leadership training programs are also available.

In addition to junior camps, Par Golf hosts adult golf camps. One, two and three day golf camps are held throughout the golf season. On course instruction is a primary focus at all two and three day adult camps. Golfers learn in actual playing scenarios instead of just on a driving range.

Par Golf Camps is offering weekend junior programs beginning in May.-Call us for more information.

Recipe ideas from Out of the Cold

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If you happen to be at Holy Blossom Temple on a winter Thursday afternoon, you'll be certain to notice luscious smells wafting from the kitchen.

Investigate, and you'll find a group of about 16 people peeling, chopping and sauteing in preparation for the weekly Out of the Cold dinner that feeds about 100 guests.

Sue Devor, a longtime volunteer and one of three women in charge of the dinner, says that each week they prepare, among other things, 50 pounds of potatoes, 50 to 100 pounds of chicken or meat, "lots and lots" of onions, 20 heads of lettuce, six pounds of tomatoes, eight cucumbers, two bunches of celery and three bunches of scallions.

As well, she said, they bake muffins to hand out to guests as they wait to come in.

Volunteers come to the temple in a number of shifts. As well as the cooks, a group comes early on Thursday to prepare the lunch bags, another comes in to serve the guests and clean up, and yet another comes in early Friday morning to prepare a hot breakfast for the guests before they leave.

Three women in charge of the dinner decide on the weekly menu, Devor said, "but we don't serve anything I wouldn't serve to guests at my own home. We're always looking for new ways to shmear and bake chicken."

On this particular Thursday, the menu included salad, hamburgers with sauteed mushrooms and onions, oven fried potatoes, mixed vegetables, with freshly baked tarts and cut-up fresh fruit for dessert.

"From the feedback we get we know the guests love potatoes – never instant mashed – so we try and serve them every week."

Leftover non-perishable items are donated to a food bank, Devor said, and perishables are frozen. "We have the occasional leftover night which goes over very well, and once a year a temple member donates brisket – that's the favourite night of the year."

Devor, formerly of Sweet Sue Pastries, said that when she decided to become a volunteer, she wanted a job that had a direct effect on people. "When I serve a meal to guests, I can see how appreciative they are. That makes me feel good."

She said they have a cookbook with recipes that serve a large group, but they have put together a book of Out of the Cold recipes adapted for family use. Here is a sampling of the recipes:

RIDICULOUSLY EASY BANANA MUFFINS (OR LOAF OR CAKE)

2-3 very ripe bananas peeled and mashed
¼ cup flour
1 tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
2 eggs
⅓ cup oil
1 cup sugar
½ tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 350. Grease muffin tin, loaf pan or 8-in. square pan. (You can also use cupcake liners for muffins.) Combine the flour, baking soda and salt. Set aside. In another bowl, whisk together the eggs, oil, sugar and vanilla and then stir in mashed banana. Add the banana mixture to the flour mixture and stir until well blended. Pour batter into muffin tin, loaf pan or square pan. Muffin will bake in about 20 minutes, loaf in about 50-60 minutes and cake in about 35 minutes. Done when toothpick stuck into centre comes out clean.

Food processor method – Process banana pieces with eggs, oil, sugar and vanilla. Add dry ingredients. Process on/off just until mixed. Pour into prepared pan. Makes 10-12 muffins.

ROASTED CAULIFLOWER SOUP

1 cauliflower cut in pieces olive oil coarse salt
pepper
1 tbsp. butter or margarine
1 large or 2 small leeks washed and sliced (white part only) or 1 onion chopped
salt and pepper
¼ tsp. ginger
1 potato peeled and cut up
2 cups stock (chicken or vegetable)
½ cup white wine (or ¼ cup dry vermouth or ¼ cup sherry) (No wine or spirits are used at Out of the Cold, so stock may be substituted)
pepper
¼ tsp. thyme (optional)
2 stems fresh dill or ½ tsp. dill weed (optional)

Spread cauliflower pieces in single layer in shallow baking pan. Drizzle with a little olive oil. Sprinkle with some coarse salt and pepper. Bake at 400 until cooked and golden in colour (about 10-15 minutes). If you wish, set aside some of the smaller, darker pieces of the grilled cauliflower to add to the soup before serving.

In a large pot, melt butter or margarine. Stir in leeks or onion and cook until slightly softened. Season with a little salt and pepper and the ginger. Add remaining ingredients and the cauliflower, using more or less stock. Vegetables should just be covered with liquid. Simmer, covered, for about 20 minutes until all the vegetables are very soft. Strain and puree the solids. Return to liquid. (Or puree with a wand blender.) Mix well. Taste and adjust seasoning. Add reserved cauliflower pieces. Heat and serve. If soup is thick, add additional stock or wine. Makes 8-12 servings

MUSHROOM BARLEY SOUP

1 onion peeled and chopped
2-3 carrots peeled and chopped
2-3 stalks celery chopped or sliced
1 lb. mushrooms sliced
½ cup pearl barley
2 tbsp. margarine
3 tbsp. all-purpose flour
7 cups vegetable stock
½ cup white wine (or more)
1 tsp. dried dill weed or 1-2 tbsp. chopped dill
salt and pepper

Melt margarine in large pot over medium-high heat. Add onions, carrots, celery, mushrooms and barley. Cook over medium-low heat, stirring occasionally, until vegetables begin to brown (about 15-20 minutes). Add flour to pot and stir 5 minutes. Gradually mix in stock, wine and dill weed. Bring soup to a boil, stirring frequently. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Reduce heat to low and simmer, covered, until barley is tender and soup is beginning to thicken (for at least 1 hour).

This soup is extra delicious if made the day before. You may also add any leftover vegetables such as diced potatoes, beans, cauliflower, etc. Makes 10-12 servings.

Volunteers are seen cooking at Holy Blossom's Out of the Cold program. [Carolyn Blackman photos]

PINEAPPLE CHICKEN

2 chickens cut up
1 cup brown sugar
1 cup ketchup
½ cup water or juice from canned pineapple
2 tsp. dry mustard
¼-½ tsp. Tabasco or to taste
1 large can pineapple chunks drained

Preheat oven to 375. Combine all ingredients except pineapple chunks. Mix well. Spread over chicken pieces. Place chicken pieces skin side up in baking pan in a single layer. Sprinkle over the drained pineapple chunks. Pour over any remaining sauce. Bake uncovered at 375 for about 1 hour. Baste occasionally. Makes 8 servings.

APRICOT GLAZED CHICKEN

10 chicken pieces
1 cup apricot jam (8 oz.)
¼ cup Dijon mustard
¼ cup soy sauce
¼-½ tsp. Tabasco sauce or to taste
3 cloves garlic chopped
1 tbsp. fresh ginger minced

Preheat oven to 375. Mix together all ingredients except chicken and bring to boil over low heat, mixing well. Place chicken in shallow oblong roasting pans. Brush apricot glaze on chicken. Bake 40-50 minutes at 375, basting occasionally. Makes 4-5 servings.

CHINESE DRESSING

1 small green onion cut in pieces
1 dime sized piece of fresh ginger
1 large clove garlic
¼ cup white vinegar
¼ cup soy sauce
3 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. dry mustard
½ tsp. Worcestershire sauce
¼ cup vegetable oil
2 tbsp. sesame oil

Into bowl of food processor fitted with steel blades, with machine running drop green onion, ginger and garlic. Process until very finely chopped. Add remaining ingredients and process until well combined.

This dressing has many delicious uses – for salads, for pasta, for "wokking," for marinating…

An even easier "Asian" dressing: ½ cup olive oil and ¼ cup seasoned rice vinegar. Combine together in a covered jar and shake, shake, shake!

SIMPLE, SIMPLE, SIMPLE SALAD DRESSING

½ cup mayonnaise or Miracle Whip (or more)
¼ cup oil
¼ cup red wine vinegar (or other vinegar)
¼ cup sugar

Combine ingredients very well. It is easiest to use a whisk. This dressing is most suitable on a rather robust salad (e.g. romaine or head lettuce with cucumber, radishes, sugar snap peas, cherry tomatoes, thickly sliced mushrooms).

DEEP DISH APPLE CAKE

Apples
6-8 apples peeled and sliced
⅓ cup white sugar
¼ tsp. cinnamon
2 tbsp. flour

Combine apples, sugar, cinnamon and flour and spread on bottom of 9 x 13-in. baking dish.

Cake
2 eggs
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
⅔ cup oil
1½ cups flour
2 tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt
3 tbsp. orange juice

Preheat oven to 350. Combine eggs, sugar and vanilla and beat until fluffy. Add oil and beat well. Sift together flour, baking powder and salt. Add alternately with juice to egg mixture. Mix just until combined. Do not overbeat. Spread over prepared apples. Bake at 350 for 45-55 minutes. A tester inserted into the batter of the cake will come out dry.

Other fruit works very well (e.g., blueberries and nectarines or canned cherry pie filling mixed with fresh apples).

Self-heating kosher meals available

BY DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

The box looks like those TV dinners that people used to pop in the microwave or oven. But this ready-to-serve meal can be served up piping hot without using either a microwave or a conventional oven.

The box contains a full meal that, with the help of a douse of specially treated water, magically heats up in the box before your very eyes. No kitchen required.

Introduced two years ago, LaBriute meals, on display recently at Kosherfest 2005 in New York City, have been used by travellers, campers, students, and office workers – anyone who needs a quick kosher meal but doesn't have access to a fridge, stove or microwave oven.

Now, LaBriute meals are widely available at most kosher independents and local grocers in Toronto.

Cooking the food requires nothing more than opening a pouch of the provided liquid, pouring it over a heating pad, placing the food tray on top, then putting it back in the re-closed box.

The food heats up in about 10 to 20 minutes.

Kosher travellers won't have to worry any more about the availability of suitable food while on the road, and students in dorms with few kosher options can stock the boxes in their cupboards.

The meals require no refrigeration and remain fresh for up to 24 months.

Meat, dairy and vegetarian options are available, for a total of 11 different meals, including vegetable beef stew, chicken primavera with noodles, turkey and mashed potatoes, cheese ravioli in Italian tomato sauce, and vegetarian Honolulu nuggets with pineapple in tomato sauce. All include soup, snack, a napkin, condiments and all necessary utensils.

Meals from LaBriute, which means "to health" in Hebrew, are also being used as rescue rations by emergency relief organizations due to their compactness, portability and long shelf life.

For example, the company says the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey now uses LaBriute meals as part of its emergency security plans, to be used as needed in the field by its workers or for distribution to the public in the event of an emergency.

According to the company, as a result of more than 20 hurricanes in the past year, many Americans from the southeastern United States, along with residents in other hurricane-prone regions, have stocked up on self-heating, self-contained LaBriute meals.

Consumer demand led the company to pursue widespread distribution in Canada, said Abe Halberstam, LaBriute's founder.

עלילות המן

שרת החינוך לבנת דרשת ממנכ"לית משרד החינוך להתפטר מתפקידה בשל הצטרפותה ל"קדימה", ולא עובר חודש ולבנת עצמה מתפטרת מן הממשלה בינגד לרצונה, על פי דרישת נתניהו. בבחירות הפנימיות לליכוד מצליח נתניהו לדחוק את רגלי כל השרים ממפלגתו, כמו גם את כל אלה שמרדו בשרון, ובוחר רשימה אשכנזית צעירה. התגובה? ירידה במשאלי דעת הקהל, קרוב לודאי בגלל הזנחת מצביעי עדות המזרח. פשוט מדהים איך הקמת "קדימה" על ידי שרון טרפה לחלוטין את כל קלפי הפוליטיקה הישראלית.

דבר אחד בטוח: המצביע הישראלי אינו בכיסו של אף אחד. הוא ציני, ספקן, לא מאמין למילים גדולות, ומעניש רמאים ושקרנים. ואולי זה הסממן הכי חשוב של דמוקרטיה בריאה . אבל שישאר בינינו

Netanyahu offers to make concessions for peace

By GIL HOFFMAN
Jerusalem Post

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu promised the Palestinians on Sunday that if he is elected prime minister, he will be willing to make compromises and offer them concessions without sacrificing Israel's security.

Speaking at the Institute for Policy and Strategy's annual Herzliya Conference on the Balance of Israel's National Security, geared to Israel's political, military, intelligence, economic and social leadership, Netanyahu said he would begin by removing settlement outposts, and then he would gradually remove IDF checkpoints to allow unhindered Palestinian travel. He said a Likud-led government would not be in favour of reoccupying or annexing Palestinian populated areas of Judea and Samaria.

"In the framework of a peace agreement, a government under my leadership would agree to make real territorial concessions but will not compromise our security borders," Netanyahu said. "We want there to be less friction. We want to remove outposts to help the Palestinian population. We will not reoccupy the Palestinian population."

Netanyahu outlined five points that will be the guidelines in the Likud's platform on diplomatic and security issues: "yes to compromises within a peace agreement, yes to security borders, no to a unilateral withdrawal, yes to moving the security fence and yes to decreasing the friction with the Palestinians."

The Likud's "security borders" include the Jordan Valley, the Golan Heights, the Judean desert, an undivided Jerusalem, settlement blocs in Judea and Samaria and the hilltops overlooking Ben-Gurion Airport, the Gush Dan region and Road 443.

Netanyahu said he would be willing to negotiate a permanent-status accord with a responsible Palestinian leadership while sticking to those borders on the basis of reciprocity. Any agreement reached with the Palestinians would then be brought to a vote by the Israeli people in a national referendum.

As reported exclusively in Sunday's Jerusalem Post, Netanyahu said he would favour shifting the security fence to ensure that Ben-Gurion Airport, Road 443 and Road Six would not be within the range of missiles. He said a buffer zone would also be needed near the Dead Sea to respond to the security threat from the east.

Netanyahu's associates responded that shifting the fence would require legal action. They said the fence has been moved from the route recommended by security officials because the Supreme Court relied on international law in lieu of Israeli laws. Netanyahu wants the law changed to give the Supreme Court the means to accept the original route.

Lashing out at the two parties that a Likud spokesman on Sunday called the "Siamese twins," Netanyahu said both Labor and Kadima see the 1967 borders as their endgame with only minor adjustments. By contrast, he said, Likud believes that withdrawing to the 1967 borders would perpetuate the conflict.

Olmert facing many challenges

They also used threatening and insulting language. The wife of prominent settler Rabbi Moshe Levinger railed at the police, "Sharon is dying because of our curses. You are next."

Israeli commentators agree that the showdown goes well beyond the few shops being evacuated in Hebron. The settlers have two goals, they say: to cloud the memory of the successful and relatively peaceful evacuation of Gaza, and to drive home the message that any further attempted withdrawal will encounter fierce opposition.

"It is enough to look at the statements of a few settler leaders to understand that the struggle is to obscure the success of the disengagement from Gaza by standing firm against the government in the West Bank and Jerusalem," Ha'aretz wrote in an editorial. "Olmert, who supported the disengagement and sees himself as Ariel Sharon's heir, will not be able to explain away any weakness he shows when confronted by a group of hooligans."

Yediot Achronot's military analyst Alex Fishman added that "anyone privy to the settler scene would have known that after the disengagement, things in the West Bank would escalate, the settlers' council would lose its power and the extremist margins would expand and grow even more extreme."

Faced with the settler challenge, Olmert has been talking tough. In a government meeting Monday, he banged his fist on the table and promised zero tolerance toward the extremists, whom he described as "a particularly violent group."

The immediate result was an army order declaring the disputed market a closed military zone, and instructing soldiers and police to eject anyone who doesn't live there.

By Tuesday, most of the outside settlers had been sent packing, on the understanding that the eviction of the Hebron settlers who had taken up residence in the market would be postponed for two weeks. Whether this proves a brilliant tactical retreat – enabling the government to go in with much bigger forces next time – or a costly show of weakness remains to be seen.

Olmert's next vital decision may be what to do about Hamas. By allowing Palestinians to vote in Jerusalem and Hamas to participate in the election, he has already laid himself open to a welter of right-wing criticism. The Likud's Silvan Shalom, who resigned on Sunday as foreign minister, charged that Olmert has triggered a process that inevitably will lead to Israel's negotiating with a terrorist organization that doesn't recognize the Jewish state.

There is talk of plans for Olmert to fly to Washington soon after the Palestinian ballot to co-ordinate positions on Hamas with the Bush administration. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has said that to participate in government, Hamas will have to accept all previous Palestinian agreements with Israel, including recognition of Israel.

Israel and the United States will probably add two more conditions: that Hamas desist from terrorism and that it disarm its militia. Unless that happens, Israel could well find itself without a peace partner on the Palestinian side.

That leads to Olmert's third big decision. His position on peacemaking with the Palestinians has been to insist that the internationally approved "road map" plan is the only game in town. But if Hamas' inclusion in a Palestinian government makes talks impossible, will Olmert be ready to go into more detail than Sharon about possible unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank?

Former Mossad analyst Yossi Alpher, now co-editor of the website www.bitterlemons.org, thinks he will.

"Olmert, who, to his credit, started talking about disengagement and the need to avoid a South African scenario at least a year before Sharon, may feel a need to be more explicit on these issues to ensure that the public understands why he is different from Likud and Labor," Alpher says.

The decisions for Olmert are particularly tricky because they occur in the run-up to an election and could have electoral fallout. Moreover, whatever Olmert does will be measured against what people think Sharon would have done.

So far Olmert is riding high: polls give his Kadima party between 40 and 52 seats in the 120-member Knesset. That's more than its two closest rivals, Labor and Likud, together.

Still, mistakes on the key issues could hurt Olmert's electoral prospects – and also prove costly for Israel.

Pentagon mole gets 12 years for passing classified info

By NATHAN GUTTMAN
Jerusalem Post

WASHINGTON — Larry Franklin, the former Pentagon analyst sentenced on Jan. 20 to 12 years and seven months in prison for passing classified information to Israeli diplomats and staffers in the pro-Israel lobby AIPAC, will testify against those former employees when their trial begins in late April.

The sentence was part of a plea bargain between Franklin and the prosecution in which he agreed to testify against Steve Rosen and Keith Weissman in return for dismissing some of the charges against him.

Franklin's sentence may be reduced significantly if the prosecution is satisfied with his co-operation in the Rosen-Weissman trial.

At the sentence hearing of the U.S. District Court in Alexandria, Va., Judge T.S. Ellis seemed to show sympathy to the defendant, saying he was convinced Franklin, 59, did not intend to harm the United States when he passed on classified information obtained through his work at the Iran desk in the Pentagon.

Ellis said Franklin was concerned about "threats to the United States," yet he concluded he had broken the law and "we can't have that in this country."

The 12-year sentence is the lowest possible under federal sentencing guidelines.

Franklin pleaded guilty to three charges: conspiracy to communicate national defence information to persons not entitled to receive it; conspiracy to communicate classified information to an agent of a foreign government; and unlawful retention of national defence information. The maximum punishment for the original counts is 25 years and a $10,000 fine, which was rescinded because Franklin forfeited his government pension.

Franklin entered the plea bargain last fall and has since been co-operating with prosecutors. If Franklin's testimony against Rosen and Weissman is considered satisfactory, the prosecution can put in a motion to change his sentence to one that's less than federal sentencing guidelines. He won't have to begin his jail term until he finishes testifying.

The indictment says Franklin was in close contact with the AIPAC staffers and on several occasions gave them information about threats to the United States from Iran and information on Iraq. According to the prosecution, Franklin, who was frustrated by U.S. policy regarding these threats, used Rosen and Weissman to convey information to the higher levels. He also gave classified information to Naor Gilon, the former political officer at the Israeli Embassy in Washington, who is now back in Israel.

Franklin's sentencing marks the end of the first phase of the AIPAC-Franklin case, but the Rosen-Weissman trial, which begins April 25, is expected to be the more significant.

Lawyers for the defendants have been trying to force the prosecution to disclose the surveillance tapes on which the indictment was based. The tapes, which represent more than four years of FBI tracking of the AIPAC staffers, are protected as classified and the government says it can't disclose them. The defendants claim there's no sense keeping the tapes classified because they document conversations with Rosen and Weissman.

Rosen and Weissman were fired by AIPAC last April and are in a dispute with AIPAC over funds for their defence.

The prosecution and defence have contacted Israeli officials to request co-operation in the case and for possible depositions from diplomats involved. Israeli justice and foreign ministry officials have met U.S. officials, but no agreement has been reached so far. Sources close to the Israeli officials said it's unlikely the Israelis will testify.

Speaking Jan. 20, Israeli Ambassador Daniel Ayalon called the case "an internal American issue," adding "Israel has no connection to the trial and obviously no connection to its results."

Pollard petition rejected

Israel's High Court of Justice rejected Jonathan Pollard's petition to name him a Prisoner of Zion. The court ruled last week that Pollard, a former U.S. Navy analyst serving a life sentence in a U.S. jail for spying for Israel, does not meet the criteria for the designation, mainly because the United States is not considered a country hostile to Israel or to Jews. Pollard and his supporters had hoped the designation would help efforts to get him released.

Exports to Ireland jump

Israeli exports to Ireland rose dramatically in 2005. Trade in chemical products accounted for a large proportion of the increase, according to figures released by Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics. Sales of Israeli products in Ireland rose 18 per cent over the first 11 months of the year to $147.8 million (US) from $125.4 million in the same period in 2004. Exports of chemical products nearly tripled to $20.7 million from $6.7 million. External trade in machinery and electrical equipment accounted for the bulk of the total at $86 million.

Sharon opens eyes

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon briefly opened his eyes twice on Jan. 16 when a recording of his grandson's voice was played, aides and relatives said. It was the most encouraging sign since Sharon was placed in a coma as surgeons treated a massive stroke he suffered Jan. 4. But doctors played down hopes of a speedy recovery, saying Sharon's eye movement may have been a reflex reaction.

Olmert takes Kadima reins

The Kadima Party's Knesset faction on Jan. 16 named Ehud Olmert, already the stand-in for the ailing Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, as acting chairman of the ruling party. Barring a sudden recovery by Sharon, Olmert will run in the March 28 election as Kadima's candidate for prime minister.

Israeli morale high: study

Israelis withstood the psychological pressure of the past five years of Palestinian terrorism, a new study says. According to Israel's National Resilience: The Influence of the Second Intifadah on Israeli Society, a Tel Aviv University study published last week, Palestinian terror groups failed to break Israelis' national spirit. The study cited sustained levels of optimism during the worst suicide bombing campaigns, the stability of national institutions and the speed with which the country returned to routine life after attacks.

Israir to fly to New York

A second Israeli airline has received permission to fly the premier Tel Aviv-New York route. Tourism Minister Avraham Hirchson said Jan. 16 that Israir will get "second designated carrier status" for the route, operating initially for two years. It's not clear when flights would begin. El Al, the Israeli airline that dominates the route, plans to challenge Hirchson's decision at the High Court of Justice.

Deal possible on capital: poll

Almost two-thirds of Israelis would agree to ceding areas of east Jerusalem to the Palestinians under a peace deal, according to a poll published last week by the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies. Some 63 per cent of Israelis would give up Arab neighbourhoods in the capital to reach a deal, although most rule out such concessions on the Western Wall and Temple Mount, and most believe a deal won't come about under current conditions.

Jordan bars Orthodox Jews

Jordan is preventing Orthodox Jewish Israelis from entering the country, ostensibly for fear they could be attacked, Israel's Foreign Ministry said. The announcement came Jan. 18 as Jordan refused entry to eight Israeli tourists at a border crossing after prayer shawls and other religious items were found. Foreign Ministry officials told Ha'aretz that Israeli officials are trying to convince Jordan to change the policy.

Barghouti calls for Fatah-Hamas unity

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
Jerusalem Post

RAMALLAH — Jailed Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti on Sunday called on Hamas and other Palestinian factions to join a broad national coalition after Wednesday's parliamentary election.

Fatah and Hamas "are heading toward being partners in the field and in parliament," he said.

Barghouti's remarks were made during an interview with Al-Jazeera in his prison cell, the first since his arrest in 2002. But as the interview was being aired, the Palestinian Authority ordered the closure of Hamas' new Aqsa TV station in the Gaza Strip.

The decision was strongly condemned by Hamas, which accused the PA leadership of seeking to prevent it from winning the vote.

Some Palestinians see the interview as an attempt by Israel and the United States to bolster Fatah's standing on the eve of the vote.

"Why are they suddenly allowing Marwan to appear on television?" asked a Hamas supporter here. "The Israelis and the Americans realize that Fatah is in a very bad situation and are trying to help it."

An independent candidate who asked not to be named said there were "troubling signs" of the growing involvement of Israel, the United States and some European countries in the election campaign. "Millions of dollars are being invested in certain candidates and lists," he charged.

Majida al-Batsh, a Jerusalem-based journalist with Agence France Press who is running in the election, said many candidates and lists were buying votes with money provided by foreign parties.

"In the past, Arab countries used to buy Palestinian parties and organizations. Now, western countries are doing this," she said.

On Sunday, the streets of Ramallah and its twin city, al-Bireh, were full of supporters of various candidates and lists. Some 20 Fatah activists gathered near Manara Square in downtown Ramallah, chanting slogans and singing songs praising their party and Yasser Arafat. Palestinian police vehicles parked nearby were covered with Fatah and Arafat posters, a move that has drawn sharp criticism from human rights groups and some international monitors.

Several vans recruited by Hamas were driven through the streets flying the movement's green flags, playing Islamic songs and recordings of slain Hamas leader Abdel Aziz Rantisi saying force is the only language Jews understand.

In the interview with Al-Jazeera, Barghouti urged Palestinians not to focus on whether Fatah defeats Hamas, and to participate in the election. "From my cell, I appeal to the great Palestinian people, young and old, to take part in these elections," he said.

The elections "should be seen as one of the essential means of achieving freedom, the return [of Palestinian refugees] and independence. We should not think that the aim of Jan. 25 is the seats. There is a goal we should be prepared for: a broad national reform government with the participation of all."

Barghouti, who is serving five life terms for his role in terror attacks on Israel, hailed the "brave and courageous decision by our brothers in Hamas, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine and other factions that agreed to join the Palestinian Authority by participating in the elections."

The Palestinian people need a national salvation government, a government of national unity, he said.

Barghouti said the results of the election would be respected "100 per cent," even in the event of a victory for Hamas, which will become "an integral part of the Palestinian Authority."

Barghouti also called on Israel to end its military rule of the West Bank. "I urge the Israeli people to realize that there is no future for this occupation," he said. "This occupation is a burden. They should get rid of this burden."

Canadian hip-hop scene helped jumpstart career

who explains that his family decided to move there to reconnect with his mother's side of the family. They had moved to Canada rather than Israel when they fled Morocco. "I was supposed to go to junior high school with my friends and instead I switched my friends, my school, my language and my country. I didn't want to leave Israel.

"I spent most of my first year in Canada crying to my parents," recalls Haddad. "In retrospect, I realize that I never really let myself adjust."

It didn't help that on his first day at public school, some of the other students threw pennies at him. "I didn't understand why they threw them at me. There was another Israeli in my class who had to explain it to me," he says. "I encountered a lot of anti-Semitism in Canada. It was tough to be an Israeli student."

For Haddad, this was a far cry from the place he had come from. He remembers himself as a kid in Israel, listening to pirate Israeli radio that played hip-hop and attending Friday evening "Class Nights." "I used to bring my Mickey Mouse lunchbox full of tapes and DJ for my class," he recalls. "I was always a music freak."

In addition to anti-Semitism, Haddad experienced a different sort of rejection in Montreal – one that hit a little closer to home. "Some Jewish people also snubbed me," he says. "First, on the grounds of being Israeli. For some reason – maybe because we're loud and tend to speak with our hands – a lot of people think we're barbaric. Second, because I went to public school and I had a lot of Arabic, black and Hispanic friends," he says. "I wasn't a 'good, little Jewish boy.' I didn't dress like them, I didn't speak like them, and as a result, I was an outcast.

"In general, I never really left Israel. I had one foot in Canada. But my heart was still in Israel."

The story of Haddad's life – from Israel to Canada and back – is described in Chapters, the title song of his first album (2001). "It's about the chapters of my life," says Haddad of the six-minute song. "The first verse talks about my move from Israel to Montreal, the second verse talks about the adjustment, and the third talks about the move back."

His stage name, SHI 360, is representative of this metamorphosis. SHI is an acronym that stands for Supreme Hebrew Intelekt, and 360 refers to the full circle he has completed by returning to Israel and his roots, to restart his life from scratch.

Although he decided to return to Israel, Haddad is quick to point out the pluses of his Canadian experience. "I love Canada now," he says, but admits that it was only in his last few years there that he really started to gain an appreciation for the country. "I have a great advantage over most people because I have benefited from experiencing both worlds."

If not for Canada, Haddad may not have gained an appreciation for French rap. "My favourite hip-hop is French," says the trilingual rapper."

More importantly, the Canadian hip-hop scene helped to jump-start his musical career. "In Canada, I really discovered my passion for hip-hop," he says, adding that he started going to open mike nights and recording in Montreal, where he released his first vinyl single, Linguistiks, through his own label, Intelekt Musik, in 2000.

"In Israel, there's a real lack of knowledge about the history of hip-hop, and its foundation," he says, and "in general, hip-hop in Israel doesn't have a big street movement."

Haddad hopes to change that. He also hopes to promote the growth of hip-hop genres in the country. "The scene here really blew up with political, Zionist rap," he says, adding that the scene, which boasts only about four top rappers, lacks variety. Take his rap, which he defines as "conscious," since it deals with social issues and "things that consciously bother me." Haddad says it is the limitations of the Israel scene that led to radio's rejection of his song Break the Silence, from the CD Chai. Break the Silence addresses kids who are being abused at home, urging them to speak up about it. "The video is doing really well right now," he says. "But the radio didn't think it was a hit. They like fun songs… But I'm going to change that, I hope."

Haddad says he's focusing on developing other Israeli artists on his new label, Emet (Truth), which is an acronym in Hebrew that stands for art, music and culture; setting up his new recording studio; and producing his new line of hip-hop clothing, For Real, while continuing to DJ at Tel Aviv's Boca Club and Gat Rimon Monday and Tuesday nights. "It's not easy to do hip-hop full time, but I'm doing it," says Haddad, who notes that the piracy in Israel is the highest in the world after China. "It's very difficult here."

Despite that, Haddad loves Israel with his heart and soul. He released Chai there with good reason. "Chai was about getting back to life," says Haddad. "This is the only place I feel at home."

History teacher fights anti-Semitism in France

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

PARIS — Iannis Roder stands resolutely on the frontlines in the battle against anti-Semitism in France.

The 34-year-old junior high school history teacher has been fighting racial prejudice on a microcosmic level in his classroom at least since the outbreak of the latest wave of anti-Semitic violence here about five years ago.

Iannis Roder

The majority of the attackers who have targeted French Jews have been identified as Muslims. Sadly enough, their anti-Jewish animus has surfaced in Roder's classes in the form of comments uttered by a handful of his Arab and African Muslim students, aged 14 to 16.

Roder works in Saint Denis, one of the drab working-class suburbs north of Paris where serious civil unrest occurred last fall. Like the rioters themselves, most of his students are Muslims of North African and black African origin.

"Many of them have come under the influence of radical imams," he said in an interview. "Since they're in difficult social and economic circumstances, they are prey to extremism. School, therefore, is the only place where they can hear the truth."

Nearly four years ago, Roder and seven of his fellow teachers who toil in these depressed suburbs sounded an alarm about the racist, and particularly the anti-Semitic, attitudes among a small minority of their students.

Their book of essays, The Lost Territories of the Republic, was something of cause célèbre, as well as a best-seller.

"It was an eye opener to politicians," Roder said.

The minister of education summoned them for discussions and one of President Jacques Chirac's advisers conferred with them.

Roder believes that The Lost Territories of the Republic, scheduled to be published in an English edition, was a factor in the government's decision in 2004 to ban the hijab – the Muslim girls' head scarf – and other overt religious symbols in French public schools.

"This provision creates a neutral atmosphere and gender equality in schools," he said.

The first sign of open anti-Semitism among Muslim students in the suburbs appeared during and after the 1991 Gulf War. The eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000 and the terrorist incidents in the United States on Sept. 11, 2001, emboldened them, he said.

In an average year, Roder said, two to three Muslim students in his class of 25, where three-quarters of the pupils are Muslims, make derogatory outbursts. In a few cases, the verbal abusers are Roman Catholics. In the face of these unsettling incidents, the remaining students are usually conspicuously silent.

In a classic anti-Semitic canard, one student claimed that Jews had been forewarned to avoid the World Trade Center, destroyed by Arab terrorists on Sept. 11. This accusation was just the opening shot in a series of calumnies, Roder said.

"Jewish students were singled out as representatives of Israel. They were not perceived as French citizens. They were reproached for being Jewish. They were described as misers and as intrinsically evil. Their physical appearance was an issue. Still other students talked about the role of Jews in the media and finance."

This abuse usually bubbles to the surface when Roder teaches his class about the Holocaust, a mandatory subject in French schools since the mid-1980s.

"I remember one student saying, 'Are you really going to tell me Jews are victims?'"

None of his students has actually denied the Holocaust, but once, when Roder pointed out that six million Jews were exterminated by the Nazis and their collaborators, he heard snide comments ranging from "Hitler would have been a good Muslim" to "The Jews deserved their fate."

Some even wondered out loud whether Roder – who has a cousin in Toronto – is Jewish. In fact, he is a Jew. During the Holocaust, his grandparents, Jews of Hungarian and Romanian descent, went into hiding in France and were helped by a policeman and a prison warden. Six of his French relatives were deported and four survived. Distant relatives in Hungary were deported, too.

> Roder's Jewish students tormented by classmates

Over the years, Roder has had only a handful of Jewish students, but this year, he has none.

All the Jewish students he has taught, having been tormented by their fellow students' anti-Semitic taunts, left his class and switched to Jewish and even Catholic schools.

Roder's responds to his pupils' anti-Semitism with icy detachment. "I ask them to elaborate. I want them to release their emotions. Then I demolish their arguments. They listen, but two days later, they repeat their comments."

He admits that their remarks are personally hurtful, and that he has considered asking for a transfer. "It is hard for me, but these students need me."

In general, they come from socially conservative backgrounds in which anti-Semitism is entrenched in their culture.

Since their grasp of the Arab-Israeli conflict is very shaky, they spout well-worn cliches: Jews stole Palestinian lands. Jews kill Palestinians. Jews are guilty of genocide.

All too often, their vocabularies are extremely limited, and they have trouble articulating ideas. "They don't understand the world." As a result, a disturbingly high proportion of his students fail to advance to university and become members of the underclass.

They are also convinced the world is against them. "They're locked into a psychosis of victimization," he observed.

The schools they attend tend to be wracked by violence, and bullying is a common phenomenon. Teachers like Roder have been subjected to what he calls " physical aggression," although he notes that up to now, he has not been attacked by a student.

French politicians are not only aware of the new, post-2000 anti-Semitism, but want to combat it, he said.

Roder expressed concern that last year's riots may erupt yet again, perhaps on a larger scale, if the yawning chasm between the disaffected youths of the suburbs and French society is not sufficiently bridged.

To Roder, Islamic fundamentalism is a problem that Muslims themselves must ultimately address. "But moderate Muslims are not speaking up," he said, voicing despair.

SUICIDE BOMBING IN TEL AVIV: An injured man is taken to hospital by paramedics after a suicide bomber blew himself up in a Tel Aviv restaurant last Thursday. At least 20 people were wounded, one seriously and five moderately. The only fatality was the bomber, a man pretending to sell disposable razors who was identified as a 22 year-old resident of the Balata refugee camp near Nablus. Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the bombing, which was the sixth suicide attack inside Israel in the past 12 months. Police believe the bomber triggered his device in the restaurant's bathroom, where he may have been trying to prepare it and it exploded prematurely. [Isranet photo]

Artist pays tribute to Toronto architecture

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Since as long as she could remember, Toronto artist Linda R. Goldman loved the architecture of houses and buildings.

"I am totally devastated at how quickly the landscape of Toronto is changing. Beautiful houses and buildings are being torn down," says Goldman.

To capture many existing and now-gone buildings, over the years Goldman has created these images in paintings, photographs and fabric art — tapestries and quilting.

Starting Feb. 11, the Market Gallery in the St. Lawrence Market in Toronto will exhibit her textile art, watercolours and photographs in an exhibition titled, "Windows, Gables, Gingerbread and Gargoyles".

"Some of my favourite works," says Goldman, "are the Kiever Synagogue on Bellevue Ave. in Kensington Market and Fire station #23 on Howland Avenue. And I fell in love with the glory and beauty of the Flatiron Building in downtown Toronto which I pass every day on my way to work."

Goldman, who worked in the graphic arts department of the Toronto Public Library, is now the supervisor of the St. Lawrence Library at Sherbourne and Front streets.

Goldman attended William Lyon McKenzie Collegiate and went on to study art at Central Technical Art School, graduating in 1971. She studied with Doris McCarthy, a well-known Scarborough artist.

She notes that two of her mentors were Edward Hopper, an American painter who loved buildings and Albert Frank, a Dutch artist who lived in Toronto and painted street scenes and back alleys.

"Since I was a child, I always walked around with a sketch pad. My real love of painting houses and street scenes began when I was at Central Tech. Along with still life paintings, we were assigned to do water colour paintings of houses and street scenes in the area."

Goldman traveled around Europe for a year and spent six months on a kibbutz in Israel. While at Usha Kibbutz near Haifa, she made an appliquéd tapestry, a wall hanging of the kibbutz using remnants of materials, beads, buttons, shoe laces and other scraps. She adds layer by layer creating the structures and shadows.

Kiever synagogue water colour by Linda R. Goldman

Her tapestry of the kibbutz includes some buildings, farm equipment, cows, citrus groves and an Arab village in the background.

Known as an appliqué illustrator, she has had works featured in newspapers, magazines, on television, and at numerous venues throughout the city.

Her commissions include television mogul Moses Znaimer, lawyer Clayton Ruby and former Toronto mayor June Rowlands.

A resident of the Annex, Goldman says she became aware of the beauty of the Victorian houses with gingerbread trim and the gargoyles on inner city buildings. "I began photographing their intricate details."

Goldman's art is always evolving. "It all began with watercolours. From paintings, to photographs, and then I began to do my hand sewn hangings which create a photographic-like realism."

One of her three-section appliqué wall hangings titled Spadina Avenue, with a streetcar, people and a man on a motorcycle, is on display at the Baycrest Centre.

Goldman taught quilting and created some of her own pieces, notably, a Holocaust Memorial quilt that features the names and photographs of members of her family who were victims of the Holocaust.

Goldman's "Windows, Gables, Gingerbread and Gargoyles" exhibition runs from Feb. 11 to March 26, The Market Gallery in the St. Lawrence Market, 95 Front St. E., Toronto. Email lindyquilt@hotmail.com, or call 416-534 2515.

Fateless captures the essence of boy's Holocaust experience

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Like the finest films about the Holocaust, Lajos Koltai's Fateless captures the full range of emotions – the shuddering shock, the cold fear, the utter bewilderment, the profound degradation and the abject humiliation – felt by its hapless victims.

The film, set in Budapest, Auschwitz-Birkenau and Buchenwald, unfolds through the eyes of a cool, intelligent 14-year-old Jewish teenager who barely survives his ordeal.

Screened at the Toronto International Film Festival and scheduled to open in local theatres on Feb. 3, Fateless is based on Imre Kertesz's eponymous novel, which was cited when he won the Nobel Prize for literature in 2002. And because the screenplay was written by Kertesz himself, the movie is unceasingly faithful to the spirit and letter of his book.

The mood of despair that pervades Fateless is quickly established. In a dim flat in Budapest, Hungarian Jews speak glumly of their uncertain future.

Gyuri Koves (Marcell Nagy), the central character, must suddenly adjust to unpleasant realities. His father is on the cusp of being called up as a forced labourer. His mother, a remote figure, is divorced from his father. Across the room, an old woman wearing a mandatory yellow star sinks into despondency. "What has the world come to?" she wails.

Amid the desperation, illusions flourish. One man claims that the Nazis are persecuting Jews to squeeze concessions out of the Allies. Another says that Hungary cannot be compared with Poland, where German death camps consume Jews by the thousands on a daily basis.

Their speculative comments add up to little as rumours abound that Jews in Budapest are disappearing or being subjected to anti-Semitic laws.

Gyuri, a solemn boy with a sad demeanour, realizes that his carefree, youthful days have ended. Yet he is remarkably resilient. Responding to the bleats of a Jewish girl who hates being hated, he allows himself the luxury of believing that the wrath of the state is not personally directed against him.

Koltai distills the essence of their dire predicament with quick, efficient brushstrokes.

And he rises to the occasion in charting the mind-numbing deportations and in documenting the primitive, mean-spirited anti-Semitism of the Hungarian police, who ruthlessly round up Jews, brutally insult them, cynically accuse them of base, unfounded crimes and shamelessly try to extort their valuables.

Fateless is beautifully photographed by Gyula Pados, and that is to be expected from a film by a director who himself is a renowned cinematographer.

The closeups of the intended victims are revealing, portraying pain and puzzlement, while the sweeping shots of the countryside are simply poetic.

Marcell Nagy in Fateless

Pados' sharp evocations of the stark, ghostly concentration camps, in rain and shine, are brilliant. The images are reminiscent of those in a previous film on the Holocaust, The Grey Zone. The smokestacks of the crematoria belch black smoke. An overseer slaps an inmate because he has not shaved. A prisoner falls from exhaustion or sickness, plopping into a puddle as other inmates watch impassively.

Gyuri's mettle is tested to the limit in the camps. He is strong and resolute, but Bandi Citrom (Aron Dimeny), a fellow Jew from Budapest who was a forced labourer in Ukraine, helps him immeasurably, protecting him from the indignities of the guards.

Citrom's inspirational optimism is a source of strength for Gyuri, but the camp routine grinds him down, while hunger and rampant disease also take its toll. He loses his will to live as one of his knees swells and pus forms, but Citrom rescues him in the nick of time.

Finally liberated by American troops, Gyuri returns to Hungary against the advice of a well-meaning soldier (Daniel Craig, the new James Bond), who warns him that he is not welcome there as a Jew.

Gyuri, masterfully portrayed by Nagy, accepts his fate and goes back home, where life is gradually returning to normal. But after the Holocaust, nothing can ever be the same again, and this is a point that Fateless leaves us to ponder.

Young producer seeks to attract his generation to musicals

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

He may have started off performing for his family in his basement, putting on shows such as Polka Dot Door at age three and later Phantom of the Opera using dressed up dolls as cast members while his sister did the lighting.

But at 23, actor/producer Mitchell Marcus has already embraced the public stage with his talents and is currently gearing up for the opening of john & jen, his second produced musical created under his own theatre company, Acting Up Stage.

And there's nothing he'd rather be doing, not even television shows or movies.

"Getting a response from an audience right in front of you is very thrilling," said Marcus. "I also like that theatre provides a bit of an elevated reality, and the actors only get one take.

"Being a producer is also so strangely, artistically satisfying, because I feel like the centre spoke of this wheel that keeps moving."

Marcus was hooked on performing after he won a karaoke competiton at Thornhill's Promenade Mall when he was 10, with a rendition of Bryan Adams' (Everything I Do) I Do It For You.

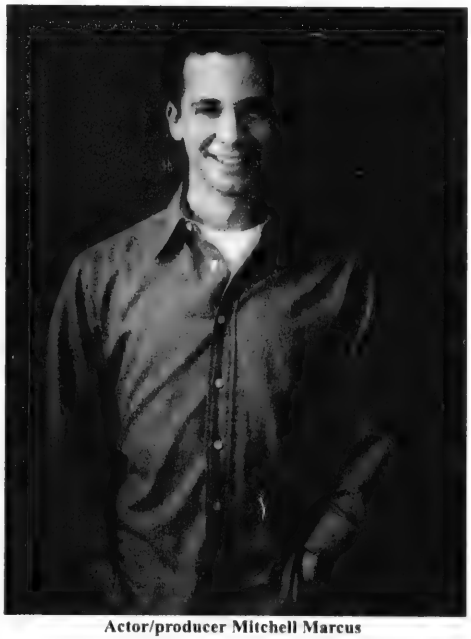
Singing seemed to come naturally to Marcus, whose father often sang and played guitar at home. He didn't take any vocal training until his teenage years.

Marcus also directed a musical rendition of CATS at CHAT, ran a drama program at Camp Solelim, and later served as program director for Camp Biluim in Montreal.

While majoring in the fine arts cultural studies program with a focus in arts administration at York University, he took on more professional theatre work three or four times a year with such companies as Drayton Entertainment and Sunshine Festival Theatre.

He also produced A Thousand Clowns with Encore Entertainment and was production assistant for the It's Always Something Variety Show, working with such stars as Eric McCormack, Drew Carey, and Colm Wilkinson.

With his outgoing nature and love of performing, Marcus asserts he doesn't get stage fright, as long as he feels prepared.



Actor/producer Mitchell Marcus

The only time he felt somewhat jittery was when he risked producing and starring in a production of David French's Salt-Water Moon, which served as a substitute for an internship he was to complete through the York program.

But the show went well, and with newfound confidence Marcus founded his theatre company in May 2004. The company is dedicated to producing intimate musical theatre productions while garnering a new generation of audiences through thought-provoking, contemporary works.

"I felt there weren't enough musicals that young people could relate to as theirs and that would challenge them and make them think," he said. "I believe the only way to sustain musical theatre is to get those people to come out."

He managed to successfully do so last year with his lively production of tick, tick...BOOM! The rock and pop musical by Jonathan Larson, Tony Award-winning author of Broadway's RENT, starred Dean Armstrong (Broadway's RENT, TV's Queer As Folk).

Marcus's latest play, john & jen, reveals the complex relationships between Jen and two Johns of her life: a younger brother who was killed in Vietnam and her growing son. Starring Stephanie Roth (U.S. national tour of RENT, Stratford Festival) and Kyle Blair (Stratford Festival), this musical is sure to leave audiences moved, contemplating life, and perhaps even reminiscing their own family ties.

> Musical speaks to the life and experiences of young people

"When I discovered the CD for the play, I loved it right away," said Marcus. "It had beautiful music, and I found the story to be very touching and accessible because it dealt with family, which is a fairly important motif in my life.

"Also, because in the bulk of the show one of the characters deals with being a teenager, it also speaks to the life experiences of the audience that I'm trying to reach."

Renowned New York writer Andrew Lippa, who spends his high holidays with his parents while serving as a cantor at Vancouver's Beth Tikvah Synagogue, wrote the music for the play and co-wrote the book with Tom Greenwald.

"He's been very kind, answering any questions and giving advice, and he's been very supportive of this Toronto production," said Marcus.

john & jen premiers Jan.26 at the Walmer Centre Theatre, 185 Lowther Ave. Toronto, where it will run until Feb. 11. For more information call 416-927-7880 or visit www.johnandjen.ca

Secret Files of the Inquisition is compelling TV

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Convert or die!

This heart-rending admonition rang out and reverberated as a wave of religious intolerance washed over Spain in the 14th century.

This development changed the course of Jewish history and is the subject of Secret Files of the Inquisition, an illuminating four-part Canadian series by David Rabinovitch due to start on Wednesday, Feb. 1, at 10 p.m on Vision TV.

As we learn in the opening episode, the Inquisition actually began in 1233 in southern France, when Pope Gregory IX charged the Dominican order with wiping out heresy among a dissident Christian sect known as Catharism.

This crackdown, enforced by ambitious priests, was unleashed because the church was basically unwilling to bend to the needs of the people and adapt to changing times.

The Inquisition spread to Spain in 1391, when radical Catholic priests demanded that Spanish Jews convert to Christianity or suffer the consequences.

By some estimates, half of the Jews embraced Christianity in the name of self-preservation. These New Christians, the Conversos, prospered and some became members of the Spanish elite.

But soon their world came crashing down. Old Christians, jealous of their success in trade, commerce and the professions, railed against them. Catholic zealots sharply questioned their commitment to Christianity and accused them of secretly practising Judaism.

Re-creation of a scene of a Jewish ritual in 15th-century Spain. Constanza de Perpinan and her husband, Manuel de Almazan have their child circumcised by the mohel.

It is indeed true that more than a few of the Conversos made a show of being Christians in public while hewing to Judaism in private. Branded as "Judaizers," they were accused of subverting the Catholic faith.

In 1478, King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, the monarchs who dreamed of consolidating the principalities of the Iberian peninsula into a pure, unified Catholic state, persuaded Pope Sixtus IV to agree to the Spanish Inquisition.

Notorious for its cruel practices, the Inquisition was under the leadership of an ardent Converso, the Dominican priest Tomas de Torquemada. He aimed his wrath exclusively at fellow Conversos who had strayed from Catholic dogma.

During the first five years of the Inquisition, thousands of Conversos were burned at the stake and tortured. By one estimate, 15 per cent of Spain's population was affected by the Inquisition.

Among the Conversos to be persecuted were Jaime de Montessa, a respected judge, and Cinfa Cacavi, a young wife and mother. Through dramatizations, Rabinovitch illustrates their dilemmas and fears.

Such incidents prompted Conversos to launch life-saving appeals to Ferdinand and Isabella, as well as the pope, but their desperate efforts fell on deaf ears.

In 1492, Torquemada took the Inquisition to its logical conclusion, convincing the king and queen to expunge Jews from Spain in what would be a process of ethnic cleansing.

Jews were given an ultimatum: convert to Christianity or leave Spain within three months. One third emigrated and one-third converted. The rest dithered, paying a fierce price for their irresolution.

Judging by the first two episodes, narrated by the Canadian actor Colm Feore, Secret Files of the Inquisition is compelling TV, a window into a terrible era.

Irving Layton's lasting legacy

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Notable amidst the outpouring of affection upon Irving Layton's death were the voices of younger poets. This went far beyond the expected heartfelt appreciation from Leonard Cohen, and though it was largely centred in Montreal, there were poets farther afield who remembered Layton fondly and with respect, as a mentor and literary ground-breaker.

One columnist in the Montreal Gazette wondered about the central role of poets in Layton's funeral service. But this should have surprised no one. It reflected a rare lack of pro forma blarney, which often smothers the memorial events of well-known people. Layton's most remarkable influence was on the poets of both his own generation and that which followed his. He asserted his ideals in the classrooms of York and Concordia universities, while mentoring young writers through his personal attentions. These efforts amounted to a second, hidden career that was not necessarily known to Layton's readers and the general public.

Norman Ravvin

His motivation to teach derived in part from a need to make a living as a literary worker in this country. But the most startling evidence of Layton's dedication to the life of literature can be found in his published letters, Wild Gooseberries: The Selected Letters of Irving Layton. Layton wrote mountains of letters. He inundated friends, publishers, reviewers and protégés with detailed descriptions of his own doings, alongside appreciations of the activities of his correspondents. The question of who would receive his mantle as the representative of Canadian Jewish poets came up now and again, as he changed his mind about likely recipients. Cohen, and Montreal poet David Solway were often proposed, while Seymour Mayne and Kenneth Sherman received intermittent nods.

From the other side of this correspondence, younger poets acknowledged Layton's patience and hospitality. Kenneth Sherman recalls a box of wine delivered to his apartment door when Layton discovered that Sherman's place was wineless – a poetic transgression of the highest order. Another writer recalls $50 fluttering from an envelope as an offer of support in hard times.

Early on, Layton saw the value of gathering coteries, whether to promote small-press publishing or to simply create a buzz around himself and his friends. His efforts with the First Statement and Contact presses, and at the little magazine CIV/n, were far ahead of their time. They preceded the small-press explosion of the late 1960s in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, and they highlighted the particularities of Canadian writing before the popularity of a national culture was affirmed by Expo 67 and the excitement surrounding Trudeaumania. These efforts were best appreciated by poets and editors as the kind of foundation work that ends up profiting a great many others.

Layton's most relevant and influential period in the public eye dated between 1956 and the late '70s, when his books, his ideas and the force of his personality made repeated waves and were routinely reported in the press. The early date marks the appearance of his collection The Improved Binoculars, which was anointed by the American poet William Carlos Williams in a now-famous preface: "When I first clapped eyes on the poems of Irving Layton, two years ago, I let out a yell of joy… As far as deftness in the craft of a poet, I think he can do anything he wants to… There will, if I am not mistaken, be a battle: Layton against the rest of the world. With his vigour and abilities who shall not say that Canada will not have produced one of the West's most famous poets?"

This was the crucial stamp of approval that gave Layton international credentials and linked him with the most influential poetic movement in the United States. True to form, Layton rejected the full embrace of his American admirers. As a young man, he wanted influence and attention, but not at the expense of being beholden to any senior figure.

The books of the late 1950s and early '60s were ground-breaking collections of sharp, uncluttered, often satirical poetry. In 1959, he published a selected works, titled A Red Carpet for the Sun, which gathered poems written between 1942 and 1958. It included a blustery foreword, which was a blueprint for the kind of missives he would attach to many of his later books: "Why are people destructive and joy-hating? Is it perception of the unimportance of their lives finally penetrating the bark of their complacency and egotism?" His 1964 collection, The Laughing Rooster, focuses on new work, while his success is signalled by the back-cover copy: "Irving Layton has become a legend in his own time. Canada's most widely read and controversial poet, his reputation grows with each book he publishes." McClelland and Stewart assigned Frank Newfeld, its most inspired book designer, to these projects, and the books themselves have a character all their own. They are artifacts of Layton-ness, as it was taking shape in the '60s.

The crowning works of the period between the mid-'50s and the late '70s are two slim, angry volumes, For My Brother Jesus (1976) and The Covenant (1977). At this stage of his career, Layton fully embraced difficult Jewish themes as the motivating concerns of his work. The Holocaust shifted to the forefront of his poetry, as did Layton's assertion that "Christianity is founded neither on myth nor fiction but on an ignoble lie," Jewish guilt in Jesus' death, whose centrality to the faith "has been responsible for the cruel deaths of millions of innocent people by blazing faggot, sword and hunger; most recently, by chemicals and mass executions."

These partisan books drew the interest of Jewish and non-Jewish readers, and provided journalists and reviewers with a new hook on which to hang provocative commentary. What followed was never quite so vibrant, but how much vibrancy should we expect of one man? Layton's forceful personality and influential work would be, to an extent, obscured by his tumultuous personal life, his moves between Ontario and Quebec, and more recently, his illness. But there is room now to stand back from all of this to recognize the fine and solid accomplishments of the key decades that stand at the centre of a long career. Layton's funeral in Montreal confirmed the impact of these years, as one poet after another suggested that without Layton, they might not have seen their own goals so clearly.

Norman Ravvin's essays on Jewish writing are collected in A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory. In 2006, he will publish a new introduction to a rereleased novel by Henry Kreisel, The Rich Man. He is chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

A wake-up call from God

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

Two months ago, on a snowy Friday, I was involved in a bad car accident on Highway 407 as I was on my way to pick up my children from school.

I was watching the gently falling snow when a car stopped suddenly in front of me. I tried to brake, but I had no traction. As my car swerved left and right, I thought, "I can handle this. I learned to drive in Montreal winters, where the snow and ice are far more challenging and frequent!" But no matter what I did, I couldn't correct my positioning.

I remember giving up and leaving it to "fate" to determine what happens. I swerved into a large van and, as a result of the impact, did a 360-degree turn. Before I knew it, I was on the edge of the opposite lane, far away from where I started. Miraculously, my car stopped, and I was "safely" on the shoulder of the highway – facing the wrong direction, but out of traffic. I sat stunned, shaking. All I could think of was that I had to get to my children. They would be expecting me. Frantically, I called their schools to say I would be delayed, fully intending to drive my smashed car to get them.

Then I heard a loud knock on my window. A kind but frantic police officer wanted to know if I was alright. I told him I was fine, just a little shaken. He made sure I was OK before rushing off to more critical accidents up ahead, one of which, he told me, was fatal.

As I kept calling the schools, a tow truck driver knocked on my window asking if I needed help. I told him I was fine and would drive off shortly, but he insisted it would be extremely unsafe for me to drive my car. I assumed he just wanted to charge me a high towing fee. Yet, he seemed so nice and sincere, and cars were whipping by, and I really didn't want to drive at that point, so I decided to be towed. He waited patiently while I arranged alternative transportation for my kids.

Once everything was set, I got out of my car and noticed that the large white van I had hit was way on the other side of the highway. I called out to the driver to ask if he was OK. He, too, was perfectly fine. He managed to cross the highway on foot, and we exchanged the necessary information, both feeling very thankful to be alive.

As I walked over to get in the tow truck, it occurred to me that I was on the edge of a highway, and that if another car slid out of control, I could have been killed. I quickly got into the tow truck.

The driver was talking on the phone to his brother, who is also a tow truck driver. He was up ahead where someone was lying dead, legless. The man survived the multi-car accident, but was killed by an out-of-control car when he went out to check the damage. That could have been me.

The driver and I started talking, and he asked me if I was Jewish. "Yes," I said proudly, "and it's almost the Sabbath, and I have to get home to my family."

He said, "I'm Jewish, too – Moroccan. I know I don't look Jewish, but I am."

He turned out to be the kindest, most helpful tow truck driver you'd ever meet. He brought me to a reliable body shop where I was got great service. My car was badly damaged, but repairable.

I got into a rental van and drove home to my four children: my nine-year-old twins, my 11-year-old, and my oldest, who is nearly 15.

When I arrived, I looked at my husband and each of my children. I was never so thankful to see their smiling faces, and to feel the warmth of their hugs and their abundant love.

We sat down to our Shabbat meal, and once the shock wore off, I realized I had experienced a miracle, one with a powerful message: Wake up!

The Almighty made sure to send his message with impact – literally and figuratively.

He was saying, "This is your life. Make it count. Be thankful. Enjoy the wonders I have given to this world. Maximize and enrich your relationships. Know that I am close."

Since then, I've been happier, more appreciative, and more zealous in enjoying life. And I pray more. I know He is near.

I also put snow tires on my car!

Reena concert set for March 22

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

All proceeds from the upcoming concert "Hand in Hand: Special Children Helping Special Children" will go to the Reena Foundation's after-school program for special needs teenagers.

The concert, to be held March 22 at Leah Posluns Theatre, will feature such young stars as Jakie Young, Aron Swebel, Robbie Wulfsohn, Jacob Gorzhaltsam, Brittany Kay, Ashley Van Embden, Cassie Luftspring and the Rosedale Heights Jazz Band.

Kathy Laszlo, the event co-ordinator whose 19-year-old son Danny attends the Reena program, said that when it started up as a pilot project two years ago, Reena was able to keep it going four afternoons a week.

For budgetary reasons, however, the program was cut to two afternoons a week, "and they are always in danger of running out of money."

Laszlo said she called Reena president Gary Sim this past summer and proposed raising money so the program could go back to running four days a week. "He agreed, and now I have to deliver on my promise of raising the necessary funds."

The program, which runs for four hours each afternoon, offers such activities as bowling, swimming, cooking and movies, as well as dinner. All of its volunteer leaders are high school or university students.

"[The participants] are kids who need social interaction with their own peer group. We need to provide them with friends who look at them equally. It is extremely important for their self-esteem and to develop their social skills," Laszlo said.

The program also provides a respite for parents, she said, "but from the children's point of view, it is far more important."

Laszlo said that she and producer Gavin Opert chose young stars under 20 to perform in the concert because they wanted all the teens to relate to each other.

"We are so proud that these performers are volunteering their time to help out teens who are more vulnerable. The parents of special needs children are grateful that these youngsters are doing this. With so many negative things going on in today's world, this gives us hope for the future."

The program participants will be "visible" at the concert as ushers or selling popcorn, Laszlo said.

"We want the community to see that these teens are capable of doing something so when it comes time to look for a job people will know that they're valued members of society.

"These teens certainly need help, but with the proper help they can become productive."

For concert information, call Laszlo at 905-731-6606.

Volunteering at Sick Kids is 'more than a job'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Few experiences are as unnerving to a parent as taking a child to the hospital – even one as world renowned as Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children. Whether it's as an outpatient, a visitor to emergency, or an in-patient, the need for a warm smile or support is universal.

That's one reason that Women's Auxiliary president Marilyn Magerman feels so strongly about the importance of what the organization does. The mother of two children – out of four – who spent a lot of time at the hospital as youngsters, she calls her devotion to the hospital and the auxiliary "a passion."

She said that she came to community work naturally. She grew up in the tiny Jewish community of Thunder Bay (then Fort William and Port Arthur), where her parents set an example of service, not just for Jewish causes (her father used to search out Jewish boys who had been sent to work on nearby farms during World War II and invite them back for holidays), but in the general community as well. "Our responsibility was seen to not be just for 'our own,'" she said.

Magerman has been a president of B'nai Brith Women, and the founder and president of Parents of Twins, but right now her focus is on the Women's Auxiliary.

During her involvement with SickKids (as the hospital is now known), she has served in the playroom of the hematology/oncology department, the bazaar, play-park (a playroom for children waiting for appointments or for their siblings) and the surgical waiting room. She is looking forward to continuing that type of volunteer work when her tenure as president of the auxiliary ends next May.

"It is a privilege to be part of one of the best academic, medical and research centres in the world," Magerman said. "Parents expect the best care and services for their children when they come here, and they expect the same professionalism from the volunteers as they do from the staff."

That's exactly what they get, she asserts.

Marilyn Magerman at the Hospital for Sick Children

Volunteers are asked to commit to at least three hours a week and, if they can't come, are expected to find someone to replace them.

"We all take it very seriously. It's more than just a job."

The auxiliary, which is an autonomous body with its own board of directors, complements the staff in offering support, assistance and comfort, and raises funds for the hospital –$250,000 last year alone. The money comes from, among other sources, a bazaar; Bear Wear, a program selling T-shirts, sweatshirts, teddy bears and assorted memorabilia; a holiday card campaign; and proceeds from the hospital's 555 Gift Shop.

The auxiliary determines where the money will go. Among the projects funded were salaries and equipment for the play-park.

"The staff can request monies, and if we can help we do," Magerman said.

The ophthalmology department has received a RetCam from the auxiliary. The camera examines eyes in a less invasive way than used to be the case, gives results immediately, and can compare current eye conditions with previous ones. A harmonic scalpel from the auxiliary will allow the urology department to perform non-invasive surgery.

The organization has endowed a $2 million research chair in neonatology and is in the process of establishing one in hematology/oncology.

The auxiliary provides day passes to the YMCA for parents and for patients in the substance abuse program.

Magerman co-ordinates the Poster Express program. Volunteers take a cart full of posters to the rooms and each of the children chooses one to liven up his or her room. "Children really don't have a lot of choice when they are in the hospital – this gives them an option," she said.

One of Magerman's favourite projects is Bravery Beads. Patients in the hematology/oncology, immunology/allergy, cardiac and transplant departments get a different coloured and shaped bead for each procedure they undergo, which are woven into a necklace: a yellow bead for occupational therapy, a blue pearl for surgery, a small gold heart for a central- line insertion and a purple heart for an internal defibrillator. There is even a wooden face for hair loss, and an iridescent heart for someone celebrating a birthday.

"The beads serve as a journal, a documenting of a child's illness," Magerman said. "And show their bravery, not just to other people, but to themselves too."

Some women sew and knit. They make crafts that are sold in the 555 shop, as well as the hats and booties that are worn by infants in the hospital.

While some people may think that working in a children's hospital is depressing, Magerman and the other women in the auxiliary find it inspiring. "Amazing things happen here. More and more youngsters are surviving. You have to look at the positive, and see them [the children] as kids, not just as patients."

There are not many Jewish volunteers in the organization, to Magerman's regret. She would like to encourage more young Jewish women to join, although she recognizes that they often choose to help Jewish causes and is aware of the changing demographics that see women taking paying jobs rather than volunteering.

Doctors learn from each other

"[This technique] is used in the operating room for non-invasive surgeries, where small incisions are made, and the bone itself is not completely exposed and in plain view," she explained.

"It's like virtual reality, where you can see on the screen what your positioning is like, without having to X-ray over and over again, which is a big radiation dose for patients and surgeons."

After having spent time in the operating rooms with Israeli doctors, learning from them, and sharing her own research, Whyne said she hopes the exchange of ideas and information will continue.

One of her goals it to have a grant approved by the Canadian government to have Khoury, herself and doctors from Princess Margaret Hospital in Toronto work together on developing computer assisted orthopedic surgery.

"The ideal is to have knowledge gained from both sides and be able to collaborate."

NYC health unit warns against circumcision procedure

JTA

NEW YORK — New York City's health commissioner has issued an unprecedented public warning that a controversial circumcision procedure is endangering the lives of Jewish infants.

The move came after a religious court failed to meet a deadline to conclude its investigation of a mohel linked to the transmission of herpes to three babies, one of whom died.

"There exists no reasonable doubt that metzitzah b'peh [oral suction of the genital wound] can and has caused neonatal herpes infection," Dr. Thomas Frieden wrote in late December in "An Open Letter to the Jewish Community" about a procedure routinely practised by mohels in some sectors of the Orthodox community. "The Health Department recommends that infants being circumcised not undergo metzitzah b'peh."

In metzitzah b'peh, a mohel orally sucks blood from the site of the genital cut he makes during the circumcision procedure. Not all haredi groups mandate the practice, and the Rabbinical Council of America, an Orthodox organization, recommends using a sterile tube and gloves to avoid direct oral-genital contact.

However, several haredi sects insist that Halachah requires the practice, and New York City officials said mohels from these sects may also use the procedure outside their communities.

As well, some leaders in sectors of the Orthodox community where the practice is common said they would continue to insist on the procedure as a requirement of religious law.

The open letter – the New York City Health Department's first official warning against the procedure – follows an apparent breakdown in an agreement the department had with a Jewish religious court in Williamsburg, Brooklyn. In September, the city withdrew a lawsuit against a mohel that the department concluded had transmitted the disease to three babies on whom he had performed the procedure, including one who died and one who suffered brain damage. It also withdrew a court order barring him from using the technique. In exchange, Rabbi Yitzchok Fischer agreed to temporarily stop performing metzitzah b'peh.

Mature skaters gather in Metulla for tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

"Don't call them alte kakers – some of them are still in their 30s.

Some may be over the hill and others overweight, but at least they're over there, skating in the first annual International Israel Ice Hockey Tournament in Metulla.

Four teams with a total of 60 to 70 skaters took part in the tournament, which ran from Jan. 24 to 26. A Canadian team joined squads from Israel and the Israeli women's team in the fun tournament, lovingly branded an "alte kaker" event by Alan Maislin, chair of the Israel Ice Hockey Federation.

The three-day tournament "is a dream. This is our hockey mission to Israel," said Maislin, whose family was once a part owner of the Montreal Canadiens.

Alan Maislin

Advertised primarily through word of mouth, the tournament was billed as a chance to visit Israel "and promote the [country's] ice hockey program and have fun," he said.

In addition to the on-ice games, participants toured the country and laid the groundwork for future tournaments. Organizers hope that, ultimately, as many as 1,000 skaters will venture to Israel for a fun tournament, Maislin added.

The tournament is the first event on a packed hockey agenda in 2006. Off the ice, events are unfolding as expected in a bid to construct a new hockey arena in the greater Tel Aviv area. "I expect a rink to be finished and operating in 2007," Maislin said.

Placing a rink in Israel's population heartland "will change the complexion of Israeli hockey completely."

There are 95 roller hockey teams playing outdoors in Israel, consisting primarily of sabras. "They're dying to play real hockey," Maislin said.

Regardless of the expected popularity of a centrally located rink, Metulla will remain the home rink for the national team. In addition, Israeli league games will continue to be played in Metulla and northern youth will continue to develop their skills at the Canada Centre, even if the proposed rink proves popular, he said.

Israeli teams will participate in two international tournaments this spring, Maislin continued. On March 8, the under-18 junior team will gather for training camp in preparation for the IIHF World Championships, Division III. They'll be joined by Israeli players from the diaspora on March 10.

Last year's Israeli squad won a bronze medal in Bulgaria. This year, the team will not have to travel so far. The Israeli Ice Hockey Federation and the Canada Centre rink in Metulla will host the IIHF event. Maislin said he was told by no less an authority that former prime minister Shimon Peres that this will mark the first-ever world sanctioned event in Israel.

Israeli skaters will face their toughest test about a month later in Amiens, France. That's when the senior national team will face off in the IIHF Division I Group A world championships against France, Germany and England – which boast rosters consisting of professional players – as well as Hungary and Japan.

"We're up against it," admits Maislin.

Israel will be led by the Eizenman brothers – Alon, Erez and Oren – as well as Max Birbraer, a New Jersey Devils draftee who currently plays for San Diego in the East Coast Hockey League.

Israel earned the right to compete in Division I by winning the gold medal in a Division II tournament last year.

Both the senior and junior teams will be led by former Montreal Canadiens coach Jean Perron, a Stanley Cup winner.

Former NHLer Steve Dubinsky has agreed to coach Israel's women's hockey team. He will be assisted by Billy Jaffee, a colour commentator on Atlanta Thrashers radio broadcasts. The women's team will hold a tryout camp in Toronto in June.

Perron will run a summer hockey camp in Israel and in October the Israeli juniors will embark on an eight-city North American tour that will include stops in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto.

The hockey federation also has plans to ice a paraplegic team, Maislin said.

Israelis' singles hopes end early in Oz

By FRANKIE SACHS
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Anna Smashnova, Shahar Pe'er and Harel Levy all lost their opening-round matches at the Australian Open last week. Together with Tzipi Obziler's first-round defeat, the top Israeli players went 0-for-4 in the first round, leaving only the doubles competitions in which they can register success.

On that front, Andy Ram and Yoni Erlich, seeded sixth in men's doubles, rolled past Argentina's Jaun Monaco and Albert Montanes of Spain 6-3, 6-2. In the next round, they were to face the winner of the match between Americans Robby Ginepri and Bobby Reynolds and Australians Robert Smeets and Paul Baccanello.

The men's doubles draw is not an easy one, with accomplished doubles players Wayne Arthurs and Stephen Huss as potential third-round opponents and the top-seeded Bryan brothers possible quarterfinal foes.

Meanwhile, Levy and South African Chris Haggard bounced Frenchmen Marc Gicquel and Gael Monfils 6-3, 6-2. They were to next meet 13th seeds Jose Acasuso and Sebastian Prieto of Argentina.

In last week's singles action, Smashnova, the top-ranked Israeli at No. 40 in the world, lost 3-6, 6-3, 6-4 to Martina Sucha (96), despite winning more points than her opponent (90-87). Smashnova, who reached the third round last year, committed an uncharacteristic 39 unforced errors, including 12 double faults.

Pe'er (41), making her debut in the senior event at Melbourne, fell 3-6, 6-1, 6-4 to Shinobu Asagoe (39) of Japan. Pe'er was her own worst enemy, committing 55 unforced errors.

Levy (218), who already won three qualifying round matches just to reach the main draw, lost 6-4, 6-4, 6-0 to American Kevin Kim (99).

Team Israel heads to European Figure Skating Championships

By LIONEL GAFFEN
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Ice dancers Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovsky led the Israeli delegation to the 2006 European Figure Skating Championships, which ran from Jan. 16 to 22 in Lyon, France.

The world's sixth-ranked duo are preparing for the upcoming Winter Olympics, Feb. 10 to 26 in Turin, Italy. Their training in Moscow over the last few weeks was not affected by Sakhnovsky's treatment for tendonitis in his knee, and he continues to be monitored by doctors, according to Boris Chait, chair of the Israel Ice Skating Federation.

Final results were not available at press time, but the pair faced stiff competition in France, as their practice mates, Russians Tatiana and Roman Kostomarov, were competing against them yet again. The Russians, world and European champions for the past two years, were hoping to keep their crown. Elena Grushina and Ruslan Goncharov of Ukraine, bronze medalists at the 2005 World Championships and No. 2 in Europe, were looking to skate past them.

Isabelle Delobel and Olivier Schoenfelder of France, the hometown favourites, won the European bronze last year after many felt the Israelis had earned third place. At the recent International Skating Union Grand Prix Final, however, Chait and Sakhnovsky finished fourth, well ahead of Delobel and Schoenfelder. The French duo ended up in the sixth and last place.

Lithuanians Margarita Drobiazko and Povilas Vanagas were competing for the first time since Chait and Sakhnovsky were awarded the bronze medal ahead of them at the 2002 World Championships. The pair made a formal protest, which was denied.

Alexandra and Roman Zaretsky, Israel's No. 2 ice dancers, competed at the Euros for the first time this year. The sister-brother duo are still trying to prove to the Olympic Committee of Israel (OCI) that they deserve to represent the country in Turin, even though the Zaretskys have already met the criteria set by the International Olympic Committee.

In addition, the OCI has not informed the hopefuls exactly how well they have to perform at the Euros in order to secure an Olympic spot.

Roman Serov competed in the men's event. At his first European Championships last year, he managed a 19th-place finish while skating with a severe bout of the flu.

Tamar Katz did not take part this year in the ladies' event due to a stress fracture. Boris Chait said Katz may be able to perform at the World Junior Figure Skating Championships in March.

Go back to your wife, old-timer

There's something to be said about older men, but when it comes to them trying to get with younger women, I really don't have anything nice to say at all.

While such a flirtation can be flattering at first, it quickly becomes cumbersome once it becomes quite clear what our roles are.

As they try ever so hard to look nonchalant while leaning against the bar and scoping out the scene, the 40-year-old-plus men now crowding the trendier clubs play the role of the high-roller who could give the pretty young things a taste of a new lifestyle.

As if! Let's be honest. We're the ones giving them a taste of the lifestyle they were once a part of.

In fact, the twentysomethings in the crowd have the much more important role: affirming that their older counterparts are not too old just yet, and comforting them during the stages of their mid-life crises.

But enough is enough. To all the fortysomething men out there, I say, "Go home to your wives, your children and your regular lives." You've been there, you've done that and we're not about to babysit you down memory lane.

What is it about men at that stage of life? Right now, I'm worrying that my boyfriend will also go crazy when he reaches his fearful forties. Will he be deluded with thoughts of sports cars, designer leather jackets and hot young blondes, or will he be man enough to turn to his family for support during tough times?

I'm not that naïve. I know sports cars and blondes will occupy his mind no matter how old he is, just like hot cars and cute blonde men will always occupy mine. But please shake me if I'm middle aged and looking at men who were born after 1990. When I reach that age, all I can hope for is to be a role model, a confident woman who doesn't need to rely on halter tops to generate conversation.

Trust me, all you so-called men out there. A woman can smell desperation and, even more importantly, Rogaine – from a mile away. If she can't, that's probably because there's an even stronger smell of money that's masking it. And while that kind of relationship might suit you just fine, just know that money doesn't equal respect. It equals status and nice dinners.

It also doesn't equal a lifetime of happiness. We're at different stages in our lives, and when it comes down to it, we might have some stuff in common, but we'll always be one step apart. And let's face it: we'd only be using each other.

During our grandparents' – and even our parents' – eras, large age gaps between spouses were common, and such marriages often worked out. But it's important to remember that the intentions in those cases were very different.

When it comes to love, all the exceptions and clichés are true – age is just a number. But when it comes to older men wanting to recapture the days of their frivolous youth by chasing after younger women, age becomes a barrier that just shouldn't be crossed.

Too many marriages and relationships today are breaking up because of mindless infidelity. It's hard enough to trust men our own age – men who haven't yet reached this desperate stage – but how can we young women have faith in our relationships, and in the sanctity of marriage, when all around us are men who dismiss marriage and commitment, and dismantle their families?

These are the same people who are now chasing us in bars, and I can't run away fast enough.

A Family Business for over 50 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

My cousin Dora runs a catering business. We're not a large family, so my husband and I try to help out when she needs it. We have been called upon to fill in for a missing waiter, to do deliveries and sometimes even to help with the cooking. We help her whenever we can.

She recently started catering shivah meals. As it happened, I needed to order one recently, so I called her. I heard from the family that the meal was excellent.

Here is what I am upset about: Dora sent me a bill charging me full retail price. I was in shock. After all I've done for her over the years, she had the chutzpah to charge me retail. I called and asked why. She said, "You know what, you're right. I'll give you a 10 per cent discount."

I am still so angry and hurt that I can't bring myself to call her or speak to her again.

Expect Reciprocation

Dear Expect Reciprocation

It sounds like you have a very nice, close family. It also sounds like Dora is completely caught up in her business so much so that she has involved all of you in it.

Dora seems to have lost sight of what's really important: her family. It sounds like her business is her priority and everything else comes second. There is no reason she should have lost money on your order, but she certainly didn't need to profit from it, either. She was thinking about her business first. She doesn't seem to think that way when the tables are turned and she needs your help.

I don't blame you for being hurt, but I also don't think this should turn into a huge feud. You called her and made your point. She heard it, and she now has to live with how you are feeling. If you didn't strike a nerve then, chances are you never will.

Don't give up on your close family. It's not worth it. However, you do have some decisions to make. Will you continue to help Dora with her business, or will you wash your hands of it? Think long and hard, because you have to live comfortably with your family and your decision.

Spreading Judaism

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The Jewish world needs more shlichim (emissaries).

The other night Miriam and I were out for dinner at Dori and Josh's house. Josh's mom, Sheila Cohen (Engel), is a Torontonian who moved to the "Sunshine City" in the heart of Lake Country – Orillia – with her husband, Stanley.

Dori and Josh told us Sheila, a former senior Jewish community volunteer and professional in Toronto, has enlightened segments of Orillia about Judaism. A while ago, Sheila was approached by a local who said she was brought up to be anti-Semitic but now has a real interest in the Jewish people and asked for books to read on the subject. When she returned from a trip to Atlanta, Ga., she showed Sheila a picture of herself standing in front of the city's oldest shul. Sheila was delighted.

Over time I frequently hear similar accounts from people who have chosen to visit or live outside of Toronto or other metropolitan cities in environments with few or no other Jews.

Richard Ekstein frequently travels to Arab countries to sell his company's product.

He tells stories of his journeys and conversations that would often transpire with his hosts. Rick said at some point during his stay in places like the United Arab Emirates, he lets his Jewish guard down and tells his business associates that he is a Jew. Rick states that when he does so, the reception and warmth he receives does not decrease; in fact, his colleagues curiosity is generally piqued.

Geoffrey Clarfield, a development anthropologist who lived in Africa for 25 years overseeing projects in Tanzania and Kenya, has endless experiences with Africans who were interested and curious about our people and Israel. Geoffrey says that while working abroad he was regularly the only Jew for miles around and instinctively became a quiet emissary on behalf of world Jewry, conscious of his "Jewish way," and giving subtle explanations of Israel's actions.

Many Jews living in small-town Canada, Cornwall, Saskatoon, St. John or Flin Flon are appointed by fate to characterize the Jewish people, standing up for us when the situation calls for, or explaining our customs such as the Passover Seder and that "strange bread" we eat.

I grew up in Kitchener, a community formerly known as Little Berlin. Although it had its share of anti-Semites, I have dozens of memories of people asking kind-heartedly why I wore a kippah or the meaning of the Chanukah lights. As a child, my parents would invite our teachers from Shepherd Public School, such as Miss Babcock, to join us for Shabbat. They would listen carefully to my father and mother's explanation of the Day of Rest, Jewish law and stories of the Holocaust.

As Jews we have consistently faced the dark side of humanity in the shtetls of Poland and anti-Semitic Canada during World War II. It was prudent to secure ourselves from the evil of hatred insulating our families from the baton-spinning thugs of Christie Pits and the white-collar Jew haters on the boards of golf and social clubs.

Today, however, Jews from Guelph, Thunder Bay and Kenya will tell you this is a good time to aggressively introduce ourselves to the many inquisitive and friendly non-Jews who far outnumber those who would see us destroyed.

We need more shlichim to strengthen our position in the world by responding positively and thoughtfully to the wonderment of gentiles who genuinely want to know what it means to be a Jew. A lesson in how to do this well can be learned from those Jews who make homes in faraway lands, with few Jews – like Orillia, Ont.

If you have such experiences, please e-mail me. I will print excerpts in upcoming articles.

Harper stands firm on Hamas

'Must renounce any use of terrorism'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

He won't become prime minister until next Monday, but Stephen Harper has already waded into the roiling waters of Middle East politics.

At a news conference last Thursday following the shocking victory of Hamas in the Palestinian elections, Canada's prime minister-designate affirmed his support for Israel and suggested his government will not recognize Hamas if it continues to practise terrorism.

"We've always maintained that we support a secure Israel and a democratic Palestine," Harper said at his first news conference since winning a minority government in the Jan. 23 election.

"But for a nation to be truly democratic, that nation must renounce any use of terrorism," he added.

Harper said he would have more to say about the Hamas victory after he and his cabinet are sworn in on Feb. 6.

But he had much to say in a Jan. 2 conference call with Jewish leaders on where he stands on issues of concern to the Jewish community.

Harper said the Tories have "led the charge in the past couple of years to have Hamas listed as a terrorist organization, and we experienced some significant and unexpected resistance from the [Liberals] in that, so we have taken a very hard line on Hamas."

The Liberal government did not outlaw Hamas and Islamic Jihad as a terrorist organizations until 2002.

Harper called the advocacy of terror and the establishment of a stable democracy "incompatible, and we will have to see an evolution for that to be an acceptable situation."

He noted that the Palestine Liberation Organization once advocated terrorism but tended to "shift away from that position with maturity."

Andrea Bronfman

JERUSALEM — More than 500 people gathered last Friday morning under a white canvas tent in Gan Hashoshanim, the Garden of Roses, a small verdant park in the Talbieh neighbourhood of Jerusalem, to bid a last farewell to Andrea (Andy) Bronfman.

The 60-year-old philanthropist, community activist and wife of Canadian philanthropist Charles Bronfman died shortly after being hit by a taxi on Jan. 23, while walking her dog near her Upper East Side home in Manhattan.

As rain fell intermittently, former Israeli cabinet minister Rabbi Michael Melchior led the poignant 60-minute memorial service, in which a number of friends and family members eulogized Bronfman.

"To speak about Andy in the past is impossible," Rabbi Melchior said. "Thousands of people received hope in their lives because of Andy."

Among the many public causes in Israel to which Bronfman had dedicated her life was Taglit birthright israel, the highly successful program that brings Jewish young people to Israel, which she and Charles co-founded with Michael Steinhardt; the Karev Foundation (CRB Foundation), which deals with social and educational projects; and AIDA, the Association of Israel's Decorative Arts, whose purpose was to give young Israeli artists an opportunity to showcase their works throughout the world.

The park where the memorial ceremony was conducted was established by Bronfman's parents many years ago. Her sister, Marcia (Kappy) Flanders, said Bronfman had taken over its cultivation after their parents died.

New Museum Cash

WINNIPEG — The Asper Foundation said last week that it's chipping in an additional $12 million to the Canadian Museum of Human Rights project. The foundation had already pledged $8 million to the museum, slated to open in Winnipeg in 2010, bringing its total donation to $20 million. About $60 million in private funds have been raised so far for the $311-million project, which was the brainchild of the late media mogul Israel Asper. Ottawa has committed up to $100 million to the museum, while Manitoba has earmarked up to 10 per cent of the cost, and the City of Winnipeg has pledged $20 million.

DUBLIN — An Irish government committee recommended that circumcisions carried out by mohels should be permitted to continue. All other cultural and religious circumcisions should be performed by trained surgeons under the direction of the health authorities, the panel ruled. The recommendations appear in a report to the Irish health minister, who set up the committee to address ethical and medical concerns raised by circumcision practices in Ireland after a one-month-old Nigerian boy died following a home circumcision in 2003. Outside the small Jewish and Muslim communities, elective circumcision is rare in Ireland.

OU Tackles Tuition

NEW YORK — The Orthodox Union (OU) has launched an initiative aimed at helping North American Jewish parents pay for day-school and yeshiva tuition. The plan includes the group's participation in a Feb. 14 rally in Albany, N.Y., that will press for making educational expenses for private-school tuition deductible on New York state taxes. It also aims to change how schools are run, as well as develop fundraising, increase access to government funds and increase partnerships within the Jewish community, the OU said.

Demjanjuk Appeals

CLEVELAND — Ex-concentration camp guard John Demjanjuk last week appealed a recent deportation decision against him by Chief U.S. Immigration Judge Michael Creppy, who rejected his contention that he would be tortured if returned to Ukraine. Demjanjuk, 85, was a guard at the Sobibor, Majdanek and Flossenburg camps, but lied about his past when he applied to enter the United States in 1952. The Cleveland resident was acquitted in Israel in 1993 of being "Ivan the Terrible," a notorious Nazi guard.

Shul's Roof Collapses

NEW YORK — A roof collapsed Jan. 22 at the historic First Roumanian-American Congregation on New York City's Lower East Side. It was unclear whether the 150-year-old building could be salvaged, though shul leaders have vowed to rebuild. No one was injured and the shul's Torahs are reportedly safe.

Bread Backlash

MINSK — The production of a new kosher bread in a city in Belarus spurred a string of anti-Semitic newspaper articles. A recent editorial in the Mogilev Register, a local daily, warned people of the Russian Orthodox faith to avoid kosher "products in the same way they keep away from idol sacrifice," claiming the blood of sacrificed animals is used in kosher rituals. The Evening Mogilev, another daily, said the act of making food kosher is "sacrilegious and anti-Christian."

Men Charged

PARIS — Two men were charged Jan. 20 in connection with the April 2004 desecration of a Jewish cemetery in eastern France. The two men, 36 and 27, allegedly scrawled anti-Semitic and neo-Nazi phrases and symbols on 127 graves in Herrlisheim. Police said one man has neo-Nazi connections. The desecration, for which a former member of the far-right National Front was found guilty in 2004, was apparently timed to coincide with the anniversary of Hitler's death on April 30, 1945.

Ukrainian Officials Blast Private University

KYIV — Ukrainian officials have condemned the anti-Semitic activities of the country's largest private university.

On national TV on Jan. 23, Boris Tarasyuk, Ukraine's foreign minister condemned the activities at the Interregional Academy of Personnel Management, or MAUP.

"I think that all positive forces in Ukraine must evaluate the activities of MAUP. There is no place for anti-Semitism and xenophobia in Ukraine," Tarasyuk said on air. In a statement, Ukraine's education ministry asked Ukrainian law enforcement bodies to analyze the extent to which the school's actions can be prosecuted or punished.

North American Jewish leaders praised the actions.

MAUP has been responsible for a slew of anti-Semitic publications, and in a recent statement, school officials asked the United Nations to shut down the State of Israel.

No Jewish MPs in new government

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

While Canadian Jews mull over the impact of the Conservative victory in the Jan. 23 federal election – including the hope it will mean warmer relations with Israel – they are also realizing there will be no Jewish MPs on the government benches for the first time since the brief administration of Tory prime minister Joe Clark.

Jewish representation in the House of Commons will decline from six to four MPs – all of them Liberals: Irwin Cotler (Mount-Royal), Susan Kadis (Thornhill), Raymonde Folco (Laval-Les-Isles) and Anita Neville (Winnipeg South Centre).

Richard Marceau, who represented the Quebec City-area riding of Charlesbourg for the Bloc Québécois and who converted to Judaism last summer, lost to his Conservative rival, while Jacques Saada, who had served in Paul Martin's cabinet, was defeated in Brossard-La Prairie by the BQ candidate (see adjacent story).

Non-Jewish Liberal incumbents in ridings with high concentrations of Jewish voters were re-elected. And all Jewish Conservative candidates were soundly defeated: Neil Drabkin in Mount Royal, Sam Goldstein in Trinity-Spadina and Michael Mostyn in York Centre.

While "it is important to have voices representing Jewish and other ethnocultural groups, you don't have to be Jewish to bring forth the issues," Kadis told The CJN.

Liberals, she said, will continue to make the case for the Jewish community's concerns as the official Opposition.

"I do not believe that the lack of Jewish representation on the government side is going to markedly affect issues with respect to the Jewish community or Canada-Israel relations," said Ira Robinson, professor of Judaic studies at Montreal's Concordia University.

"From everything I've heard from the Conservative Party, particularly from [foreign affairs critic] Stockwell Day, I do not think Canada-Israel relations will at all be adversely affected," Robinson told The CJN.

Canadian Jews may indeed be buoyed by the past staunchly pro-Israel statements of such Conservatives as Day, Jason Kenney, and, on occasion, leader Stephen Harper himself.

The Jewish community "has a good friend in the Conservative Party," Harper told representatives of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) in a Jan. 2 conference call.

"I was raised by my father to recognize both the contribution that Jews have made to Canadian life and also to recognize that being Jewish in Canada has not always been an easy path," he told Jewish leaders, including Canadian

Marceau, Saada defeated in Quebec

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Two of the four Jewish MPs from Quebec went down to defeat in last week's federal election: cabinet minister Jacques Saada and the Bloc Québécois's Richard Marceau, who converted to Judaism last summer.

Saada, first elected in 1997, lost in Brossard-La Prairie, on Montreal's South Shore, to the Bloc's Marcel Lussier by about 1,100 votes, while Marceau, also in Parliament since 1997, was beaten by 1,400 votes by Conservative Daniel Petit in the Quebec City riding of Charlesbourg-Haute-Saint-Charles, which Marceau won by 12,000 votes in 2004.

Saada, 58, is the outgoing minister of the Economic Development Agency of Canada for the regions of Quebec, as well as the minister responsible for the Francophonie. He had previously served as government house leader.

The Muslim vote became an issue during Saada's campaign, when the online Montreal Muslim News.net

Herzliya conference (2)

Since its inception six years ago, the high-profile Herzliya conference on the balance of Israel's national security, organized by the Institute for Policy and Strategy at the Interdisciplinary Center (IDC) Herzliya, has concluded with a much-publicized, much-anticipated address by the prime minister of Israel.

From the editor's desk

In the absence this year of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who lay in Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem, unable to awake from a medically induced coma, acting prime minister Ehud Olmert delivered the closing address.

The security precautions that accompany an appearance in Israel by the country's prime minister are a thing to behold. He is enfolded by his personnel the way a cocoon enfolds a butterfly. Entirely.

A very large cadre of specialized personnel descended upon the venue – in this case, the Daniel Hotel in Herzliya – some 24 hours before his scheduled appearance, to begin securing the place at all the points of access and egress.

By the time the acting prime minister arrived at the hotel the next day, the building was in "lock-down" format. Each of the more than 300 guests invited to hear the prime minister's address had to pass through rigorous, airport-like, individual inspections before entering the room where the prime minister was to speak. The mild personal irritation that arises from the inconvenience of having to submit to the security procedures gives way to a larger feeling of respect for the people and the society that go to such great lengths to protect the leader of their government.

Olmert's speech last Tuesday was his first major policy address as acting prime minister. There was a triple-edged poignancy to its context. Though alive, Ariel Sharon was now no longer part of the political scene. The Palestinian elections for the national assembly were being held the very next day. And Israeli elections were scheduled for two months hence on March 28.

Speaking slowly and deliberately, and looking directly into the television camera, Olmert read from a prepared text. The 30-minute speech was a statement to the nation and to the Palestinians.

At the outset and at the conclusion, Olmert paid tribute to Prime Minister Sharon. And, significantly, as a way of immediately establishing the bona fides of the policies he would shortly enunciate, he also cited the teachings of Ze'ev Jabotinsky, the ideological father of Israel's political right wing.

"Ze'ev Jabotinsky defined the importance of a Jewish majority. 'The term Jewish nation is absolutely clear: it means a Jewish majority. With this, Zionism began, and it is the basis of its existence.'"

And then Olmert presented the essential point of his address.

"The existence of a Jewish majority… cannot be maintained with the continued control over the Palestinian population in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip. We firmly stand by that historic right of the people of Israel to the entire Land of Israel. Every hill in Samaria and every valley in Judea is part of our historic homeland. We do not forget this, not even for one moment.

"However, the choice between the desire to allow every Jew to live anywhere in the Land of Israel and the existence of the State of Israel as a Jewish country obligates relinquishing parts of the Land of Israel… In order to ensure the existence of a Jewish homeland, we will not be able to continue ruling over the territories in which the majority of the Palestinian population lives."

Olmert described in general terms how he intended to secure the existence of the Jewish homeland, making reference to the need to adhere to the precise obligations of the U.S., EU., UN and Russian-sponsored road map peace plan; to have clear boundaries between Israel and any Palestinian state; and to ensure Jerusalem will forever be the capital of the Jewish state.

He also appealed to the Palestinians, who in less than 12 hours would be voting for a new Palestinian Authority government.

"In 1947, the Palestinians rejected the offer to establish a country. History has provided them with another opportunity to establish an independent state. The fulfilment of this opportunity involves relinquishing some of their national dreams, just as we have relinquished some of our national dreams.

"We are interested in neighbourly relations which are good, productive and progressive. We support the establishment of a modern, democratic Palestinian state that respects civil rights and is economically prosperous. Their welfare is our welfare; their well-being is our well-being; their stability is our stability.

"I hope that the results will allow the elected government under the leadership of Mahmoud Abbas to move forward towards a settlement."

A day and a half after the acting prime minister delivered these remarks, the government of Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia resigned. President Mahmoud Abbas' ruling party, Fatah, lost the election. Hamas – religiously, ideologically and politically committed to the elimination of a sovereign Jewish state in the Middle East – won 76 of the 132 seats in the PA legislature.

The Palestinian electorate turned a deaf ear to the pleas of Israel's acting prime minister. In doing so, it appears, they may have also turned a blind eye, once again, to the beckoning path of independence and prosperity.

Harper calls comments from Iran 'unacceptable'

Jewish Congress president Ed Morgan and Marc Gold, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee.

He expressed concern about the spread of anti-Semitism "under the guise of opposition to policies of the State of Israel," adding that he's "quite troubled by a different public discourse on anti-Semitism.

"There is an intellectual discourse which tends to justify some types of anti-Semitism that has become more prevalent on campuses and other places in the last couple of decades or so," he said.

"I'm deeply troubled when I see modern forms of anti-Semitism that seek to legitimize something that I thought maybe some years ago we were starting to put to bed," Harper continued. "I'm tremendously appreciative of the contribution that Jews have made to Canada and look forward to dialoguing with, not just with the organizations, but with all Jewish Canadians on a range of public policy issues in the future."

Those issues include considering changing public policy to recognize anti-Semitism, and other particular forms of intolerance, as unique. Harper said he's also "open to [the] suggestion" of allocating federal funds to help at-risk communities, including Jews, to upgrade security at communal institutions and buildings.

Harper called the anti-Semitic statements of Iran's president "completely unacceptable and indeed highly shocking… I don't think we can overstate the degree to which we should be worried about Iran."

On the Mideast, the prime minister-designate praised the decision of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to quit the Gaza Strip as "an important step, one our party supported and one I believe the State of Israel should be congratulated on."

He said Tories would continue working toward the implementation of the "road map" peace plan, adding that a resolution to the Mideast conflict "is going to ultimately require a territorial compromise on both sides."

As well, a Conservative government "will not support resolutions at the UN that are aimed specifically at Israel or designed to create a bias in the resolution of the Middle East conflict – and I think we have a pretty consistent record on that."

He said his government would place more emphasis on relations with key allies and like-minded nations such as Israel than on the views of the United Nations.

"Israel is the only [full]-fledged, developed democracy in that part of the world, and… we share a unique relationship with Israel that we believe all freedom oriented, democratic countries should share in."

Historian Michael Brown, a professor emeritus in the Jewish studies program at York University, believes a Conservative government will not necessarily be more supportive of Israel or reject more anti-Israel resolutions at the United Nations.

"There's no reason to think that once in office, the Tories will act differently than the Liberals," Brown told JTA.

"That's a historical view, because the last time the Tories made a political campaign promise about Israel [in 1979], they were going to move the Canadian embassy to Jerusalem. They were not in power more than a couple of months before they decided they weren't going to do it."

But there is an "expectation" that the Conservatives will take a more forceful stand on "encouraging the kind of reforms that would allow the UN to fulfill the objectives it was initially designed to address," said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee. That includes moves to "end the annual cycle of Israel-bashing" at the world body.

"The Jewish community is no longer monolithic," said Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress. "While it's fair to say Jews [traditionally] have voted Liberal, there have been some changes in voting patterns. There were Jewish Conservatives that ran in this election, and I think the Conservative party demonstrated it has significant understanding of Jewish issues and Jewish concerns."

In a statement, B'nai Brith Canada said it intends "to hold our politicians to account for promises made and policies articulated during the election period."

Neville wins third term in Winnipeg riding

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Against the backdrop of polls suggesting she might be in trouble, Anita Neville, the Liberal MP for Winnipeg South Centre, was easily re-elected to a third term by a 3,000-vote margin over Conservative challenger Michael Richards.

Winnipeg South Centre is the federal riding with the largest number of Jewish voters in the city. The 2001 census reported that Jewish residents in Crescentwood, River Heights and Tuxedo – the areas that comprise much of Winnipeg South Centre – number about 7,600. Neville has represented the riding since 2000.

In the last Parliament, Neville was parliamentary secretary to the minister of heritage and culture, and she was also responsible for the status of women. She was the only Jewish MP from Manitoba in the last house and was the only Jewish candidate running in the province this time out.

In Parliament, she has been a strong advocate for Israel and Jewish causes. She co-chairs the group Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel and was involved in the drive to have Israel's Magen David Adom accepted into the International Red Cross organization.

In her election night speech to supporters, after it became clear she had won, she thanked the many volunteers who worked for her re-election. "It wasn't easy," she said. "And now we still have a lot of work to do."

She expressed her regret that Paul Martin was not going to be returning as prime minister. "We accomplished much under his leadership," she said.

"I look forward to continuing working for the people of Winnipeg South Centre and promoting the values we all cherish. We will continue to make a difference."

In the riding of Kildonan-St. Paul, which includes most of north Winnipeg on both sides of the Red River, Conservative incumbent Joy Smith easily won re-election, defeating her Liberal opponent, Terry Duguid, by about 3,000 votes.

Kildonan-St. Paul is the other riding in Winnipeg with a sizeable Jewish population. Garden City, on the west side of the river, was reported to have a Jewish population of 2,535 according to the last census, with another 1,200 Jewish residents living west of the river elsewhere in the riding.

The contest in Kildonan-St. Paul was a rematch for the two candidates. In the 2004 election, Smith, a former member of the Manitoba Legislative Assembly, squeaked out a 275-vote victory over Duguid, a former city council and mayoral candidate, in a riding that had traditionally gone Liberal or New Democratic.

For many years, the district – known as Winnipeg North – was represented by a Jew, the late David Orlikow of the NDP. He was defeated in 1988 by Liberal Rey Pagtakhan, who held the seat for the next 16 years.

Prior to the last election, the riding was split, and the eastern portion was merged with a more Conservative area east of the river. Pagtakhan ran in the western half of the riding and lost to NDP MP Judy Wasylycia-Leis, a strong supporter of Israel who was also easily re-elected this time around.

Election 2006

Cotler returned in Mount Royal with large majority

published a posting from a constituent urging his co-religionists to not vote for Saada because he is a self-declared Zionist.

The riding has 3,800 Muslims, and Lussier received a public endorsement from the anti-Israel group PAJU (Palestinian and Jewish Unity).

Saada, who was re-elected in the riding by 2,500 votes in 2004, maintained before the election that there was no erosion of the strong support he had received in the past from the riding's Muslim community.

He did not return repeated messages from The CJN at his office and home.

Marceau, 35, officially the justice critic, was the Bloc's point man on Jewish affairs, co-chairing the Canada-Israel Inter-Parliamentary Friendship Group and sponsoring the bill establishing a national Holocaust remembrance day. In November, he wrote an op-ed article in the Ottawa Citizen describing himself as a "pro-Palestinian Zionist." He deplored that Israel is "consistently held to a higher standard than other countries." The article drew criticism from pro-Palestinian activists in Quebec.

Marceau told The CJN, however, that no one should be left with the impression that his loss had anything to do with his position on Israel or his conversion.

"That is not at all the case. In fact, I had the strongest showing of all the Bloc candidates in the Quebec City region."

He described Quebec City as having a "micro-climate, that is quite peculiar" in its political tastes. "Thanks to the media, especially radio, the Conservatives were able to relay their message."

Marceau is married to Toronto native Lori Beckerman.

As expected, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler was returned to office, winning 65 per cent of ballots cast, one of the highest majorities in Canada, but down from Cotler's 75 per cent in 2004. Turnout in his riding of Mount Royal was low, however, at under 50 per cent.

Cotler, 65, first elected in a 1999 byelection, told The CJN he will stay on indefinitely, likely serving as justice critic.

Raymonde Folco, 65, was re-elected in Laval-Les Iles, one of only two ridings off the Island of Montreal to go Liberal, with a comfortable edge of 3,300 votes over Bloc candidate Christiane Pichette. Folco, a backbencher, has been in Parliament since 1997. Only about 3.6 per cent of the riding is Jewish.

Cotler's Conservative challenger and second-place finisher Neil Drabkin said he was delighted with the more than 6,000 votes he received compared to Cotler's 22,000-plus.

"The Conservatives have doubled their votes in Mount Royal from 2004 to 18 per cent. That's the best showing of any riding in the west end of Montreal, and Mount Royal is the safest Liberal seat in the country," he said.

Drabkin, 45, said he believes he made inroads among "enlightened" Jews in the riding, where Jews represent about 35 per cent of the electorate. The rest he chided for not being able to break the Liberal "habit."

"I will play as a active role as possible with the new government to make sure the agenda of the Jewish community is advanced," he said without elaborating. "Nothing has been decided."

Drabkin, now an immigration lawyer, was an aide to cabinet minister Gerry Weiner through the Mulroney years, and ran three times previously since 1993 for the Progressive Conservatives and Canadian Alliance.

He criticized the Liberals under Martin for being "unresponsive to the Jewish community and trampling on Israel... I'm quite confident that the safety and security of Israel will be reflected in our foreign policy."

Cotler said he looks forward to pursuing his priorities in opposition, including such foreign policy matters as the threat posed by Iran, the genocide in Darfur, Sudan, and United Nations reform, as well as proposed legislation that died with the election call related to women's rights, legal aid, and cruelty to animals.

Cotler said he did not believe he would become restless as an opposition member. "There is a lot of work to do. I think we can be effective, and I intend to be very active."

Cotler said he had not thought about the consequences of the new Harper cabinet being without any Jewish members. "If the government pursues the right causes and agenda, it will not make a difference. I never saw myself as a Jewish representative, but as the MP for all of Mount Royal and minister for all of Canada."

He said he found this campaign his most satisfying because of the ethnic diversity of his volunteers, coming from the Filipino, Vietnamese, Sri Lankan and other communities.

"When the historians look back on the 18 months of the Liberal minority government, they will see that we left an effective legacy, despite the three-pronged opposition attack...We were never really able to get out from under the sponsorship affair because of the opposition's ongoing indictment, and they would not take no for an answer, even when the Gomery report cleared the government of any blame or liability," he said.

"They never allowed us to really showcase, not what we wanted to do, but what, in fact, we had got done."

Cotler did give Conservative leader Stephen Harper credit for a "focused, disciplined and effective campaign."

In the riding of Outremont, the Jewish community apparently helped give outgoing Transport Minister Jean Lapierre the votes he needed for a victory by about 2,500 votes over the Bloc's Jacques Leonard. Alex Werzberger, president of the Coalition of Outremont Hassidic Organizations, said the community was split 80-20 between the Liberals and Conservatives, respectively. "In fact, we may have given the Liberals more votes than in 2004 because the turnout was higher this time," he said.

Elections in Canada

Canadian voters last week changed our federal government. Stephen Harper and the Conservative party, which he leads, won the people's mandate and constitutionally sanctioned trust to form the new government.

Given the distribution of party seats in the newly configured House of Commons, however, Harper's task may prove to be especially challenging. Even if the NDP becomes a coalition ally, the two parties do not control a majority of seats. Yet, with inter-party goodwill as a governing ethos – we hope – and the best interests of the widest possible number of Canadians as the governing imperative, the federalist parties in the House should be able to act co-operatively and constructively, as necessary, on an issue-by-issue basis.

That the prime minister is from the West, in itself, augurs well. It is a possible harbinger of reduced western alienation and increased western invigoration in the Canadian federalist compact.

That the Conservative party won representation in Quebec also augurs well. The party can truly claim national representation in the House of Commons. Moreover, it may lead the way to further federalist political inroads in Quebec in the future.

And that the separatist forces in Quebec were reduced in number of seats and in popular support is also a good result. As long as its sustaining purpose is the separation of Quebec from Canada, the Bloc Québécois cannot be a fitting ally for government legislative initiatives. We therefore urge the prime minister-designate not to undertake any legislative coalitions with the Bloc.

We congratulate Stephen Harper and the Conservative party on their victory and wish for them the wisdom to govern our highly regionalized country with wisdom, prudence, compassion and courage.

And in 'Palestine'

Two days after Canadians voted, so did Palestinians. They too voted for a change in government. But the results may soon prove to be a disaster for the Palestinians themselves. The terrorist group Hamas won a resounding victory, capturing 76 of the 132 seats in the Palestinian Legislative Assembly.

The future of Palestinian-Israel relations is murky. But one thing is for certain, even without bright light: Israel cannot and will not sit at the table with any party publicly, proudly and, most tellingly, religiously, opposed to the existence of a sovereign Jewish state in the Middle East. Given that Hamas' murderous designs upon Israel are theologically based, there is hardly room to be optimistic about any imminent change in its views of the Jewish state. We must now brace for the next developments in the Palestinian Authority.

Harper is not 'an appeasing wimp'

Canada's prime minister-designate Stephen Harper has always spoken out emphatically against United Nations resolutions that are anti-Israel. He also takes the Iranian threat to Israel and the world seriously. Canada's new federal government will be more proactive in countering this threat. As his is a minority government, I hope that the other parties in Parliament will not force Harper to be silent on these matters. He will not sit back and be an appeasing wimp.

What would Bubbie think?

Yasher koach to Israeli researchers on their extensive report and impressive findings, as reported in the article "40% of Ashkenazim share 'founding mother,'" (CJN, Jan. 19)

Now that we have scientifically determined that so many of us are direct descendants of four women from way back when, let us all learn tolerance for our "cousins." I am, of course, speaking of the intolerance that various sects of Jews today show toward one another. We should attempt to put aside our differing opinions and practices and think of how "Bubbie" would have wanted it!

Sticking together

Jews in our community must admit that, although there are highly observant, Orthodox Jews and secular Jews, and many in between, one fact remains: we are all Jews ("The importance of sticking together," CJN, Jan. 19). And it has always been this way. Furthermore, anyone who points their finger and says, "Well, you're not very Jewish," might also be considered to be "not very Jewish" by others who are even more observant then the ones pointing their fingers. Let's remember that secular Jews need observant Jews to carry the ritual torch. But observant Jews need secular Jews just as badly, to intercede on their behalf with the gentile world – a world they have little contact with. It's a shame that Jay Solomon has been forced to date outside the faith, but it's clear that observant Jews have, for all intents and purposes, not assisted non-observant Jews in that they have not provided them with any social networks in which single Jews might meet.

UJA Federation supports birthright israel

On behalf of the 99,000 Taglit-birthright israel alumni from 45 countries around the world, we are proud that Leo Davids has noted Taglit-birthright israel as an example of an organization whose strong communal leadership uses new and innovative methods to resolve the problems faced by world Jewry – namely, population decline ("World Jewry today: a demographic snapshot," CJN, Jan. 5).

As Davids points out, while the Jewish population in Israel continues to grow, the population of Diaspora Jews is steadily declining. It is with this in mind that our leadership has continued to develop new methods to attract both participants and donors and inform them of the incredible importance of uniting Jewish youth through a trip to the Holy Land.

Over the past six years, we have sent more than 99,000 Jewish young adults on 10-day, all-expense-paid trips to Israel. Not only do these trips enable participants to build intensely personal relationships with other Diaspora Jews, the trips also give participants the chance to interact with Israelis (nearly 20,000 Israelis, mostly soldiers from elite units, have participated in the trips).

As we approach the arrival of the 100,000th participant in Israel this summer, we acknowledge that Taglit-birthright israel's accomplishments would not be possible without the support of our partners: the Government of Israel, private philanthropists and Jewish communities around the world (North American Jewish federations through the United Jewish Communities, Keren Hayesod and the Jewish Agency for Israel).

Contrary to what Davids implied, and what he failed to point out, is that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has been a steadfast and enthusiastic supporter of the program since its inception six years ago. In addition, the Toronto federation and other federations across Canada have gone above and beyond their investment in the trips and created vibrant pre-trip and post-trip programming for the thousands of Canadian trip participants, most of which are run through new and innovative mediums and programs. We are proud of our partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the entire UIA Canada system.

Volunteer at Zimbabwe hospital experiences Judaism profoundly

By SARAH ZELCER

"Sarah, can you sing Shalom Rav for me?" I looked up. The request had come from Pedrinah Thistle, a local Shona woman living at the Howard Hospital, a small Salvation Army hospital in rural Zimbabwe.

We were standing in Pedrinah's kitchen, making dinner. I stopped for a moment and thought back to my summer camp days and I began to sing: "Shalom rav/ Al Yisrael amcha/ Tasim leolam." Then I stopped because I forgot the second half. Pedrinah's sweet, clear voice filled in the gap: "Ki ata hu melech adon/ Lekhol hashalom."

I looked at her, eyes wide, and she laughed, explaining that she had been taught by a volunteer who had travelled on behalf of Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee to the hospital some years before.

Since I began working with Ve'ahavta three years ago, I have curiously experienced my Judaism at profound levels in some of the most unlikely places. At times, it has happened while I was driving volunteers home from our Homework Club in Regent Park in Ve'ahavta's van, which is covered in Torahs, hearts, and the phrase "Repairing the World." My heart always dances when I get a thumbs up from strangers or realize that the person in the vehicle next to me at the light just got honked because he was lost in reading the side of our colourful tikkun-olam mobile.

At other times, it has happened in the middle of the remote Amerindian rainforest of Guyana, in villages with names like Waramadong, Kamarang, Kako or Jawalla. It is Erev Shabbat and a Ve'ahavta team of doctors, nurses, lab technologists, pharmacist, physiotherapist and social worker are squinting over a small travel siddur as the sun sets, while making kiddush over kosher grape juice.

This time, I experienced my Judaism profoundly in Zimbabwe, in a rural Salvation Army mission hospital where my colleague Geoffrey Clarfield and I spent three weeks last December.

Zimbabwe is a country in turmoil. It is magnificent, beautiful and seemingly lush during this rainy season, but is suffering the social and economic devastation of disease and poverty. Foreign aid has dwindled in Zimbabwe because of its political leadership. Within these challenging circumstances, Ve'ahavta and the Salvation Army have managed to maintain a committed and productive partnership.

Ve'ahavta has worked in Zimbabwe since 1998. Over the years, our support, partly through the Canadian government's Canadian International Development Agency and our donors in the Jewish community, has transformed the hospital from a palliative facility devastated by the AIDS pandemic to an institution that is quickly becoming a model in Zimbabwe for its treatment of patients who are infected with HIV/AIDS and tuberculosis. The Jewish community, through Ve'ahavta, has supported initiatives focusing on prevention of transmission of HIV from mother to child, as well as contributing a steady flow of supplies and providing volunteer personnel to Zimbabwe.

Sunset in the countryside

Rural home and sky

Canadian Jews have been travelling to Howard Hospital through Ve'ahavta since our joint partnership was born, lending their skills and expertise to patients. The 144-bed hospital is solely responsible for health care for approximately 250,000 living in the rural farmland that surrounds its compound.

Before we left, I was experiencing high anxiety. This was my first trip to Zimbabwe. I felt as I imagined klal Yisrael may have felt as they readied themselves for their journey through the desert – about to embark upon a journey as garim b'eretz nochria (strangers in a strange land). I had with me my 18 cents of chai money and a Tfillat Haderech, both given to me by colleagues.

As guests, Geoffrey and I were warmly welcomed. As Jews, we were celebrated. When walking in the community and meeting hospital workers, patients and volunteers, we would explain that we work with Ve'ahavta. A wide smile was generally the response. The Shona pronounce every syllable Ve'ahavta – "and you shall love" in Hebrew – clearly and gently.

In truth, we had come into the community with friendships already formed. We had known Dr. Paul Thistle and his family for years. We had also been privy to a unique experience in Toronto that helped us feel as though we were coming home.

Last year, Ve'ahavta helped some special visitors, the twins Tinashe and Tinotenda Mufuka, their mother Elizabeth and midwife Grace Chirinda, during their exceptional stay in Toronto. The formerly conjoined twin boys awaited separation surgery and later, cleft lip and palate repairs. The powerful role the Jewish community played in their story has received little mainstream publicity.

A group of dedicated Jewish volunteers gave these four Zimbabweans support and brought them into their homes, invited them for Shabbat and read Tehillim in tense moments in hospital during their eight-month stay. When Geoffrey and I arrived at the the Hospital for Sick Children (now SickKids), we were thanked over and over again, and told: "It is a privilege to meet people like you, who can welcome strangers."

A local newspaper article described the scene at Harare International Airport when the twins arrived home. "I would like to thank the Jewish community for their support," Elizabeth Mufuka told the paper.

Elizabeth is a rural Shona single mother who works her small plot of land and raises poultry for income to feed her family. To read of her standing in front of the Zimbabwean national media to thank the Jewish community was surreal and soulful.

We were welcomed into Elizabeth and Grace's homes. It was a beautiful experience to have the reciprocity of makdimim shalom l'chaverim (welcoming of friends in peace) and to meet these wonderful families in their homes in this beautiful land.

> Canadian Jews have been travelling to Howard Hospital through Ve'ahavta since our joint partnership was born, lending their skills and expertise

One day, I visited Grace, who was hard at work in the maternity ward where she is "sister in charge." At midday, there had already been several deliveries. I was struck by these women – those I saw in the ward on the cusp of giving birth and those I saw in the fields, nine months pregnant and still working, their great big bellies sticking out and occasionally stopping to stretch – who were so quietly strong. Eizeh hu chacham lomed mi kol adam – a wise person is one who learns from every person.

It was the rainy season and the steady rainfall triggered many blackouts. Sometimes in the evenings, the sky would clear to make way for a beautiful sunset. There was a perfect view of the sunset from the Thistles' window. Before the sky turned flaming orange, I would walk down to the compound boundary to get a closer look. One night a local woman asked me what I was doing. I said, "I am looking at the sky" and we both laughed. The next night she came again and we talked. I spoke to her about her life, her fears and her dreams. I learned much from her as we looked at the sky together.

In Harare, we met with Maj. Robert Ward, the head administrator of the Salvation Army and a Canadian. He had fond memories of past visits to Toronto's synagogues. His genuine delight in welcoming us as Jews to Harare was palpable.

Later that same day, we met the leaders of Harare's small but dedicated Jewish community. We were greeted like long-lost friends and were ushered into their homes in the true spirit of hachnasat orchim (welcoming of guests).

We toured one of the Ashkenazi synagogues, a beautiful building with a gorgeous Aron Kodesh and a distinguished library of Hebrew books. There is also a stunning Sephardi synagogue in Harare. We visited the Sharon Private School. The School once attracted many Jewish students. Now, there are only a handful in attendance. However, the school has maintained its Jewish studies program and is now renowned for the quality of its interfaith education. We were told that a young Shona child took home the Hebrew-language prize last year.

We left our Jewish friends in Harare, knowing that we will see one another again, and feeling emboldened and strengthened by the anticipation of renewed connection.

The mitzvah of bikur cholim (visiting the sick) is in constant practise at the Howard Hospital. Before the end of our stay, we went out with the hospital chaplain who is involved with a home-based care program there. The area around the hospital is large and rural, and many patients cannot afford, or are too ill, to travel to the hospital. Community caregivers are responsible for the large rural area and small villages surrounding the hospital. These caregivers direct the chaplain to visit those most in need on the days when a vehicle and petrol are accessible for home visits.

I left Howard Hospital on the third day of Chanukah. On my last night, I taught a few of the local kids how to play the dreidel game. I lit Chanukah candles in the window of my little round thatched-roof guest cottage. Paul tried to create a festive atmosphere for me by playing the March of the Living CD, left behind a number of years ago. I explained that the music was beautiful but not quite in the spirit of the chag. Paul seemed disappointed, then asked if we could turn the CD off after the song Lay Down Your Arms. I nodded and laughed.

When saying goodbye, I left behind my mini Shabbat bencher, my travelling chanukiyah and candles for future Ve'ahavta volunteers. Pedrinah carefully placed them in a cupboard in her living room, which already contained Shabbat candles. "It's the Judaica cupboard," she explained.

Sarah Zelcer lives in Toronto.

Responsible death

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's recent medical emergency should alert us to extreme medical situations. Deciding on proper treatment, appointing representatives and making decisions in times of crisis are all issues we seldom face. Shouldn't we, as responsible adults, make these decisions ahead of time? Shouldn't we discuss "what ifs" with family and doctors? The reality is complex and frightening, and we shy away from them. But is it fair to our loved ones?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

And where can we find guidelines?

Judaism has a very intense commitment to healing and saving lives. It mandates all sorts of legal imperatives to enshrine the sacred reverence for all life. Yet there are also competing principles. Most importantly, there is a real appreciation for the complexity and intricate nature of the life-death nexus.

There are no easy universal answers to all medical situations. Thus, interfacing with the obligation to save a life is the legal tradition of how to treat a goses, one who is at death's door. For a goses, there are no doubts about the immanence of death. One may not prolong such a life, since that would prolong suffering, delay death and not save a life. But how are we to differentiate between saving a life and letting someone die? When is life support mandatory and when does it become an impediment to death? Judaism does not permit starvation, but respirators are not always compulsory.

These are not simple topics, nor are they easy to discuss. And though medical issues make us reliant on doctors, these should not be their decisions alone. We must follow the famous dictum of Hillel: go out and learn.

Many years ago, my father "died" during surgery. He was scheduled for a simple medical procedure (as though any surgery is simple – they cut you open). When the doctors were ready to proceed, they found no life signs and pronounced him dead. Providentially, a new doctor entered the room and revived him. My father lived another 35 years. Needless to say, the man became our doctor.

But my father's reaction always struck me as startling. He told me that he heard the doctors say: "This man is dead." "Daddy," I cried. "Why didn't you tell them you were alive? Why didn't you shout 'Save me?'" He looked at me as though I was the stupidest person in the world. "Norma, when the doctor says you're dead, you're dead!"

We could have easily lost him. I understand that he probably could not have said anything. But he didn't even try.

In his world, the doctor was always right. But not in our world. There are too many factors to consider, too many decisions. We need to take responsibility for our lives, and our deaths.

Torah shows us that the personal is political

As I write, Canada is about to choose its next government. By the time you read this, we will have a new one. Today we ask, "What makes someone fit to lead a country?" Our current crop of politicians does not inspire me to hope for great things, given the culture of patronage and entitlement that we've had since Confederation, but there you are. Between their personal peccadilloes and their political pieties, our politicians are a sad lot. None inspires confidence, neither in their personalities, nor in their politics. None exhibits the qualities of a statesman.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

However, what I want to address here is the way the Torah stories of Joseph, Judah and Moses combine the personal and the political.

In our yearly Torah cycle, we have completed the story of Joseph and his brothers. That narrative revolved around the family of Jacob, one torn by jealousy, hatred, intergenerational sibling rivalries, and violence.

It would make a great TV miniseries. Each of the characters is so vibrant and their motivations so visible, if tangled. The final frames deal with the fraught relationship of Joseph and Judah, the two brothers who are most intimately connected. While Joseph seemed to be the bright and rising star both in the family and politically, I think the hero of this saga is Judah.

Why? Because it falls to Judah to rescue the family of Jacob through his last-minute confession to Joseph of the sorrow that Benjamin's enslavement would bring to Jacob, and Judah's acknowledgement of the evil deed done by the brothers so long ago. Thus Judah earns the right to become the ancestor of the royal house of David, through Perez, his child with Tamar.

Earlier in the story, Judah was on the same downward path as Esau – Judah sold his brother, broke with his family, married a Canaanite woman, gave in to his passions, while maintaining the deceit practiced on Jacob.

Then, when Benjamin's life hangs in the balance, and by extension his father's life seems forfeit, Judah approaches Joseph in his disguise as a regal Egyptian and pleads for Benjamin's life.

It is the moment of Judah's ennoblement. He has learned the hard way how he embittered his father's life for 20 years. Now, self-sacrifice is the only way to save his brother and he is ready to pay the price of deception.

With his actions, Judah earns the right to be the ancestor to the kings of Israel, to establish the lineage that will rule the combined kingdoms and carry the promise that "the scepter will not depart from Judah" until the messianic era.

I hate to leave the personal, the story of Joseph and Judah, as there is something so real and so timeless about their story. But we are now at parshat Bo, deep into the story of the Exodus. Memory of Joseph's political savvy has waned, and slavery's dark night of the soul has fallen over his descendants.

With Moses, the personal gets lost in the shadow of his momentous political mission, leading us from slavery to freedom. We get only glimpses of his personal life – and it doesn't sound happy– and little insight into his feelings. We know he pleads for Miriam when she is struck with leprosy, but we have absolutely no insight into his feelings for any other human being – not for his parents or his brother Aaron, not for his wife Tziporah, not for his sons.

Moses is the quintessential "father of his country." And like statesmen and politicians everywhere, his life will be forever sacrificed to his mission, forging a people out of a ragged bunch of whiners. Forbidden from seeing the fruition of his work, he dies looking toward the land that he will never enter.

I eagerly await next year's reading of the Joseph story, because in it I find vivid human beings with real flaws, real nobility, real passion, real atonement and real forgiveness. In the sphere of the political, as our new leaders can attest, there seems to be only punishment and personal disappointment.

To our new government, I can only say,"Good luck. You'll need it."

And so will we.

Human rights education in Canada

Although the protection of human rights has occupied significant attention in recent years, it is not a new phenomenon.

When asked to summarize the Torah in just a few words, the great sage Hillel said: "That which is hateful to yourself, do not do unto others. That is the heart of the Torah; all the rest is commentary."

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

This statement of the "golden rule" along with the "Holiness Code" found in Leviticus, outline the basic principles that have established the traditional Jewish commitment to social justice, fairness and the principles of human rights.

Throughout history, legal codes ranging from the Code of Hammurabi in 1750 BCE to the present age have all underscored the importance of human rights as a guiding light in ordering the affairs of societies, governments and individuals.

In the recent federal election campaign, there was much discussion by our political leaders about the importance of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the Canadian political and legal landscape. Particular attention was given to the so-called "notwithstanding" clause in the Charter.

Our judges and lawyers are charged with the responsibility of advancing the message of human rights and the protection of civil liberties.

Are our lawyers and judges equipped to fulfil this responsibility? Are we providing the legal profession with the tools to take on this task? What formal training do the members of the legal profession have in the area of human rights?

Basic training in human rights is rather limited in our education system. Various ideas are introduced through the social studies curriculum from kindergarten through Grade 12. Recent revised curricula do contain units on citizenship and global citizenship, and junior as well as senior high schools teach a limited amount about our Charter of Rights.

At the post-secondary level, students are able to take a few courses that refer to the protection of human rights.

At law school, students learn about the Charter in basic constitutional law courses. They also study about fairness and natural justice in respect of governments, their boards and agencies in mandatory administrative law courses.

A typical law school does offer other courses that specialize in human rights, but all of these courses are optional. For example, at the University of Alberta, optional courses are offered in civil liberties, human rights law, constitutional litigation, elder law, European human rights law and international human rights. Recently, a practicum opportunity with the Alberta Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Commission was added.

Upon graduation, lawyers are expected to participate in continuing legal education programs. Those programs generally emphasize the more pragmatic areas of legal practice, although occasionally a course relating to the Charter of Rights or anti-discrimination legislation may be offered.

Ultimately, some lawyers are appointed to the judiciary. Programs of judicial education have expanded dramatically over the past 30 years. These courses are offered under the auspices of the Canadian Judicial Council, a body created under the federal Judges Act. Other organizations, including the National Judicial Institute and the Canadian Institute for the Administration of Justice, administer these educational programs.

In the area of human rights, the council has created a Social Context Education program administered by the National Judicial Institute. This program emphasizes the importance of our judiciary experiencing a heightened sensitivity to issues of race, gender and related human rights issues.

With all of the educational opportunities available, should we assume that our lawyers and judges are sufficiently informed and cognizant of human rights issues?

Clearly, their formal training combined with their collective experience has been significantly enhanced in recent years. Lawyers and judges occupy a special position in society, and their sensitivity to and promotion of human rights is vital to the integrity of Canadian society and the values we hold dear.

Of course, it is important for all Canadians to be knowledgeable about, promote and embrace the message of human rights. Human rights education should be available at all levels of the school system in Canada. But, in order to have our legal system accurately reflect these values, it is especially important that our judges and lawyers be well versed in the relevant law, including any deficiencies.

This will enable them to take a strong and independent leadership role in the pursuit of Canada's human rights agenda.

The Kirshner File

Survivor recalls Holocaust in France

Two French policemen came for Roger Fraenkel on Dec. 12, 1941. Summarily arrested, he was instructed to pack a blanket, food and water. He and his family, residents of a fine house in a fashionable neighbourhood near the Arc de Triomphe in Paris, were shocked and bewildered. A French citizen, dental surgeon and World War I veteran, Fraenkel knew that the Jews of France had been placed in jeopardy by Germany's 1940 invasion, the collapse of the Third Republic, the division of France into occupied and unoccupied zones and the formation of the authoritarian and pro-Nazi Vichy regime headed by Marshall Philippe Pétain.

Sheldon Kirshner in Paris

By then, Pétain's government had promulgated anti-Semitic laws and wiped out the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man, which had emancipated French Jewry on the basis of three tenets: liberty, equality and fraternity. But Fraenkel, whose German and Russian ancestors had settled in France in the mid-17th century, did not truly understand that his arrest was a slippery slope. Thinking he would be back in a few hours, he did not even bother to kiss his wife, Jeannine, goodbye.

Nor did he realize that his fate had been irretrievably sealed. The police handed him over to the German authorities, and they, in turn, interned him in a detention camp near Compiégne. In March 1942, Fraenkel was deported to Auschwitz on what would be the first of 80 transports from France, and a few months later, he was murdered. Fraenkel's wife was not spared either. She was sent to Auschwitz in November 1943, on the 63rd transport, and gassed on arrival.

The Fraenkels, who left behind two children, Jean-Jacques and Josette, were among the 75,721 Jews of France deported during the Holocaust. Of those, only about 2,500 returned. A further 3,000 Jews were killed by the Germans and the French police, some in internment camps originally built to accommodate the wave of Spanish refugees who poured into France in the late 1930s, according to Jean-Marc Dreyfus, a professor at the Institute for Political Science in Paris.

Some 24,500 of the deportees were French citizens, while the rest were foreigners, mainly Polish, Russian, Romanian, Dutch and Belgian Jews. Of the group of Jews holding French nationality, 8,000 were children whose parents had not acquired French citizenship.

Prior to this disaster, France had a Jewish population of 350,000, of whom roughly 200,000 were French by nationality and 150,000 were stateless or held foreign passports.

Before she was rounded up and deported, Jeannine Fraenkel tried to save herself and her children. Working on the assumption that the so-called Vichy Free Zone was safer than Paris, where Jews were forced to wear the dreaded Nazi yellow star, she, Jean-Jacques and Josette moved to the French Riviera city of Cannes in August 1942. But since even Cannes was not entirely safe, Jeannine – a member of the French resistance movement – tried to send her children to neutral Switzerland. She made two such attempts in October 1942, near Chamonix, but the Swiss border guards turned them away.

Shortly afterward, the German army invaded the Free Zone and, suddenly, the Fraenkels were at the mercy of the Nazis yet again. "The Gestapo visited us," said Jean-Jacques, a young-looking 75, in an interview. Jeannine convinced the Gestapo that they were Christians, and the ploy worked because the Fraenkels had obtained false documents under the Gallic surname of Francell.

Fraenkel's Nazi yellow star

But due to that unsettling visit, Jeannine dispatched Jean-Jacques to Paris in 1943 to live with an Italian Catholic man and his Jewish wife. Josette remained with Jeannine in Cannes. By that juncture, the Jewish community in France had been marginalized, isolated, impoverished and subjected to deportations.

"The objective of Vichy's anti-Semitic laws was to exclude all Jews from civil society," explained Henry Rousso, a scholar at the Institute of Contemporary History in Paris and the author of, among other books, The Vichy Syndrome: History and Memory in France Since 1944. "There was no German pressure on Vichy to pass this legislation."

On a personal level, Pétain was not particularly anti-Semitic, nor was he obsessed by Jews, like other officials in his government. But he made anti-Semitism a cardinal pillar of his collaborationist regime, the better to assert French independence from the Germans, Rousso said.

The Vichy government, whose authority was challenged by the Free French Forces led by Charles de Gaulle, established a special department – the Commissariat aux Questions Juives – to render French Jews pariahs. It co-operated closely with the Germans. Even French Jews in Algeria, France's colony, were affected by the new order. The Cremieux decree, which had conferred French citizenship on Algerian Jews in 1870, was cancelled by Vichy in one stroke. French public opinion, meanwhile, was basically indifferent to these events, Rousso said.

Two of the Vichy regime's salient features – the imposition of the yellow star and the deportation policy – were foisted upon Vichy by the Germans, but Vichy was deeply implicated in Nazi crimes. Since the German occupying army in France was stretched thin, the Nazis had to rely on French co-operation to carry out anti-Jewish measures, especially the deportations.

The first convoy to Auschwitz pulled out of Drancy – a transit camp on the outskirts of Paris that originally had been an unfinished housing project – on March 27, 1942. Opened in 1941, Drancy was designed to hold 700 people. At its peak, more than 7,000 Jews were packed into its confines.

Half of the convoys bound for Auschwitz during the war departed from Drancy in the summer of 1942, Rousso noted. The last convoy, consisting of Jews and resistance fighters, left in August 1944, just before France was finally liberated by the Allies.

"Vichy accepted the deportations," observed Rousso. "The collaboration was complete." But French Catholic bishops, while virtually turning a blind eye to Vichy's anti-Semitic laws, denounced them.

The most infamous roundups took place on July 16 and 17, 1942 – when 12,800 Jews from Paris and its environs were arrested and taken to a sports facility known as the Vélodrome d'Hiver – and in mid-August of the same year, when an additional 7,000 Jews were arrested.

When Jeannie was caught, having been unmasked as a resistance fighter by a hairdresser, Josette found herself alone in her mother's flat. Neighbours, having heard Josette crying, helped her. Then, thanks to the French resistance, Josette survived the war in hiding in a Carmelite convent in Paris.

Since these nuns hew to an oath of silence, Josette did not utter a word for six months after the war. As Josette gradually accustomed herself to the rhythms of convent life, Jean-Jacques lived in fear in Paris, sheltered by the half-Jewish couple, never quite knowing when the Gestapo would knock on their door, burst into their apartment and arrest them all.

Jean-Jacques Fraenkel

He spent the last 18 months of the war in a juvenile boys' institution, where he was repeatedly molested by a priest. Tormented by this pedophile, Jean-Jacques tried to commit suicide.

With the German occupation over, he returned to the couple who had previously hidden him. In 1948, Jean-Jacques tried to immigrate to Palestine on the Altalena – a ship carrying illegal arms to the Irgun militia – but he was stopped by the police.

Continuing his studies, he graduated from university as an engineer. In 1997, Beit Lohamei Haghetaot in Israel published his memoirs of the Holocaust, L'Abus de Confiance, or Breach of Trust, which has yet to be issued in English.

To this day, Jean-Jacques is bitter that his parents were betrayed by fellow citizens. "Without the French police, they would not have been killed," he said.

Eager to turn a new page, he immigrated to Canada in 1975. Now retired, he lives in Victoria, B.C., for part of the year. He has two sons: Eric, a pilot, is a resident of Calgary, while Marc, who fought in the Israeli army during the Yom Kippur War, is a caterer in Cordoba, Argentina.

After World War II, Jean-Jacques received a nominal sum of money to compensate him for the murder of his parents and the loss of their possessions. In the 1980s and 1990s, he launched unsuccessful lawsuits against the French government and the railway company on behalf of his family and other survivors.

These days, he devotes a great deal of his time to helping French Holocaust survivors who have not been properly compensated for their suffering and material losses. Otherwise, he lives contentedly in Victoria.

As he put it: "I can breathe the air in Canada. I can sleep soundly."

Beth Tzedec cantor is ordained as rabbi at age 62

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Congregants at Beth Tzedec Congregation are still getting used to referring to their chazzan sheni as Rabbi Gabriel, instead of the more familiar "Cantor Gabriel."

Rabbi Tobias (Tobi) Gabriel was ordained from the Jewish Theological Seminary on Dec. 15, an accomplishment all the more impressive for the fact that he kept up with full-time synagogue duties while commuting by plane twice a week to classes in New York, just over 800 km away. Not to mention that, at age 62, the father of three and grandfather of seven is decades older than most of the students in his graduating class.

The new rabbi said there were a number of factors involved in his decision to enter rabbinical school, including "a thirst for learning," but above all he sees it as professional development.

"When you're building community and you are in a clergy capacity, you owe it to yourself to get as much knowledge as possible."

In a way, he is also returning to his roots. A native of La Paz, Bolivia, Rabbi Gabriel was raised in an Orthodox home in a small, tightly knit Jewish community by German immigrant parents who fled Europe in 1938. As a young teenager, his parents sent him from Peru (where they moved when he was 7) to New York to get a Jewish high school education.

[Frances Kraft photo]

Rabbi Tobias Gabriel

A graduate of Yeshiva University where he attended cantorial school and also took some classes in the rabbinical school, Rabbi Gabriel distanced himself shortly afterward from an Orthodoxy that he felt left little room for questioning.

"I found my niche in Conservative Judaism, which allowed me to learn and to query...in an an environment where I was still able to follow the halachic tradition."

He earned his MBA in International Marketing at the City University of New York in 1968 and embarked on a business career that took him and his family to Mexico, Peru and Israel before they immigrated to Toronto in 1990. A constant thread, however, was their involvement in local Jewish communities.

In Lima, Rabbi Gabriel served as president of the Zionist Federation of Peru for two years, and – in the absence of an Ashkenazi rabbi for almost 12 years – led services and served as cantor, religious affairs director and bar mitzvah instructor.

Following his arrival in Canada, he was involved in Shaar Shalom Congregation in Thornhill, volunteering as cantor, Torah reader and ritual committee member until he left the business world and took on the position at Beth Tzedec in 1994.

He credits family – Sara, his wife of 41 years, and their children – as well as Beth Tzedec congregants, friends and colleagues at the synagogue for making his studies possible, including scholarship funding from the synagogue and the donation of air miles by congregants.

Although it took "a bit of imagination and hard work" to convince JTS to accept him as a student while he was holding a full-time job, faculty members ended up being very supportive, he said.

Technology also "helped quite a bit," he added, referring to distance courses included in his curriculum and also his ability to use the Internet for research.

But his schedule was "brutal, to say the least," he said of the two-year endeavour. Although he was exempt from some courses because of his experience and background, he was considered a full-time student with courses two half-days a week, some distance courses, and a full-time intensive course load over his four-week summer vacation.

"There were a lot of sleepless nights and weekends," said Rabbi Gabriel. Occasionally, he noted, if a flight was delayed by weather, his colleagues at Beth Tzedec would cover for him. Likewise, faculty members at JTS were "very understanding" if he was snowed in and arrived late to class. If he couldn't make it at all, someone would tape the classes for him.

While he will maintain his ongoing duties at Beth Tzedec, where the clergy includes three other rabbis, "the congregation will dictate" any new directions Rabbi Gabriel may take in the synagogue. He will also become involved with Camp Ramah in his new capacity as a rabbi.

"It was hard going back to school," he admitted. "But I adapted rather quickly... I always loved doing research."

No matter what stage of life you're in, he said, "if you want to go for professional development, you can do it." The right attitude, time management, and "a little help from friends" ease the way, he added.

JACS forum discusses drug use among teens

'Parents are in total denial'

By KYLE GORDON
CJN Intern

JACS and Camp Solelim held an open discussion for parents and teens last week to raise awareness about alcohol and drug dependency among Jewish adolescents.

"We need to stop sweeping this issue under the table," Marla Goldman, executive director of JACS Toronto, told a gathering of roughly 35 people at the camp's office.

Chemical dependency, whether it is alcohol or drugs does not discriminate, and Jews are affected as much as any other group, Goldman said.

JACS – which is short for Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others – is a voluntary mutual self-help organization founded in April 2000 by a group of recovering and concerned Jews in Toronto. It encourages and assists Jewish alcoholics, drug addicts, their families and friends to explore recovery in a nurturing Jewish environment.

As a recovering addict, Goldman understands the importance of receiving help in a safe environment.

Jews are often afraid of attending meetings in church basements, she said.

"At JACS, people feel at home," Goldman added.

This past September, JACS established the Benji Hayward Teen Program, held every Sunday at 7:30 p.m., to provide support for the growing number of teens addicted to drugs and alcohol.

"Parents always think they know everything their children are doing. They think addiction will never happen to their kids," Goldman told the gathering.

Gord Hayward, Benji's father and chair of outreach and education with JACS, admits he thought he knew everything about his son, but he was mistaken.

On May 13, 1988, Benji, 14, and his friend attended a Pink Floyd concert at Exhibition Stadium.

"He gave me a high five and went to the show," Hayward said.

Benji did not return from the concert that night.

His father phoned police and filed a missing persons report. He distinctly remembers the police officer asking if his son was involved with drugs.

"No, we are Jewish. That stuff is for rock stars," Hayward recalled telling the officer.

An autopsy and inquest determined that Benji died from taking two hits of LSD. His body was found in Lake Ontario.

"Parents are in total denial. I was in denial. It's the 'Your kid, not mine,' syndrome," Hayward said.

For the past 2½ years, Hayward has been working with JACS to raise awareness about teenage chemical dependency. He has spoken along with Goldman at various schools and summer camps.

Risa Epstein, director of Camp Solelim, invited JACS to speak to her teenage campers last summer.

"It went so well, both the kids and staff benefited from it," Epstein said.

She organized last week's open discussion to help parents understand the pressures that teens are under and how to identify the warning signs of teenage addiction, she said.

"I wish I could get more parents out and stop thinking it's not their kids," Epstein said.

At the age of 10, Michelle, whose name has been changed to protect her identity, turned to drugs to mask the pain of her father's death.

"I loved my daddy more than anything, he was gone and I was sad. I felt numb. I was daddy's little girl," she told the group.

"This was the beginning of my hell, the beginning of my destruction," she said.

On her 13th birthday, her older brother gave her a line of cocaine. "I was hooked. I started sleeping around. I did anything for that white powder," Michelle said. "My mother didn't know the extent of my problems."

At 15, Michelle was encouraged by her boyfriend to sell her body for drugs.

"I thought this sounded like a good idea. I was 15, walking the streets at 2 a.m., and I didn't care because I had cocaine," she said.

This past October, Michelle's friends tricked her into attending a JACS meeting.

"You can't help me, I'm so far gone," she said at the meeting.

Michelle returned the following Sunday, and, to her surprise, the counsellors remembered her name.

"That was a lightning flash. It meant so much to me that they remembered my name," said the teary-eyed 17-year-old.

"JACS has brought me a completely new life. I have sober friends and I can actually say I like who I am. Today, I am three months sober," she said.

JACS conducts a resource meeting to help families and friends on Thursdays at 8 p.m. People in crisis, and their friends and families, can also call the JACS Helpline at 416-410-JACS (5227).

Taglit-birthright israel mourns the passing of Andrea M. Bronfman ז"ל

On behalf of the entire Taglit-birthright israel family, including the birthright israel Foundation and thousands of alumni from Israel and around the world, our thoughts and prayers go out to her husband, Charles, our Founding Chairman, their children, and the Bronfman and Morrison families. May they be comforted among the mourners of Zion.

Andy's tireless advocacy and support of Jewish peoplehood and improving the quality of life in the State of Israel will live on for years to come. Her personal involvement will be deeply missed.

Thousands of young people represent legacy of Andrea Bronfman z"l

Jewish world mourns co-founder of birthright israel

By YONI GOLDSTEIN
UJA Federation

There are 100,000 reasons why Andrea Bronfman, who was killed in a New York car accident last Monday, left such a deep impact on the Jewish world. That's the number of Jewish young people who have benefited from birthright israel, the popular, pioneering initiative that she and her husband Charles conceived and founded with a handful of other philanthropists in 1999. The program, backed by the Jewish Federation network, provides a free, structured visit to Israel for qualifying students. Since birthright israel began, 13,000 Canadians have taken part – two thousand of them from Toronto.

"These thousands of young people, many of whom would not have experienced Israel without the support of Andrea and Charles Bronfman, will be one of her most enduring legacies for generations to come," observed David Engel, who chairs the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Board of Directors. "We extend the deepest condolences to her husband Charles and to the large family to which she was devoted."

Toronto's Corey Segal, who once cared little about Jewish life, is typical of birthright israel participants for whom the experience will have lifelong impact.
"It just touched something inside that I feel vibrates really deep in me," said Segal.

"Andrea Bronfman was a remarkable pioneer in all the endeavours she undertook," said Dr. Shimshon Shoshani, chief executive officer of Taglit-birthright israel. "She was unique in her out-of the-box thinking; she was never satisfied with the status quo and always pushed those around her to do better. Her dedication and enthusiasm for so many projects in Israel and around the world was endless."

Known as "Andy" to her friends, Mrs. Bronfman was a strong backer of the UJA Federation system. She was a committed supporter of United Jewish Communities (UJC), the umbrella organization of North American Jewish Federations, a Lion of Judah, honouring women who make at least a $5,000 annual Federation gift, and a member of the Prime Minister's Council, which includes North America's most generous donors. One of her sons, Anthony Cohen, who lives in Toronto, is also active in the Jewish community.

"The Jewish world has lost one of its best friends, a woman who exemplified Judaism's highest values and whose vision led our community into the future for generations to come," said UJC chair Robert Goldberg.

Mrs. Bronfman was a former chair of Beth Hatefutsoth, the Jewish Diaspora Museum in Tel Aviv. On the museum's behalf, Mrs. Bronfman created and directed a national cultural project called "A Coat of Many Colours: Two Centuries of Jewish Life in Canada." The project, documenting the history of the first Jewish inhabitants of Canada, was exhibited across North America and in Israel. It included a traveling presentation with religious and cultural artifacts, historical documents, a companion book and an hour-long film.

For decades Mrs. Bronfman was instrumental in supporting Jewish communities and a wide-range of Jewish causes worldwide.

The Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies (ACBP), a family of charitable foundations operating in North America and Israel, has contributed millions of dollars since the couple founded it 20 years ago. The foundation helped to establish the Institute for the Study of Canada at Montreal's McGill University and the Association of Israel's Decorative Arts (AIDA), designed to raise awareness for Israeli artists by exposing their work to North American galleries.

"Andy's philanthropic endeavours were many and varied," said Judge Ellen Heller, president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), with which she was very involved. "Working quietly, but with fervor, she helped devise innovative ways to make our world a better place."

As well, Andrea Bronfman was a noted human-rights activist who fought hard to alleviate the plight of Jews caught inside the Soviet Union during the 1970s and 1980s. When the Communist government refused to allow Soviet Jews to immigrate to Israel, she was instrumental in forming the "Group of 35s," a Montreal-based faction of women who campaigned to support Soviet Jews and organized Canada's Jewish communities to pressure politicians to stand by Soviet Jewry. Many activists and Jewish historians remember her well for leading a protest march outside the Soviet consul in Montreal.

Her unwavering compassion was dramatically illustrated in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 when she founded and acted as deputy chair of "The Gift of New York." The not-for-profit initiative provided free admission to the families of 9/11 terrorist victims for a wide variety of events. By the time "The Gift of New York" program ended in the spring of 2003, more than 12,000 families had participated.

Andrea and Charles Bronfman shared a passion for Israel and generally spent about a quarter of each year living in the Jerusalem neighborhood of Talbieh. In 2002, Ehud Olmert, Israel's acting prime minister and the city's mayor at the time, awarded the couple honourary Jerusalem citizenship as well as a key to the city.

Mrs. Bronfman is survived by her husband, three children from a previous marriage, two stepchildren and six grandchildren.

Putting tikkun olam into practice

By JOANNE FRISCH

Guest Voice

"Way beyond!" is a phrase that best conveys the gist of what I experienced last year.

On Jan. 16, 2005, I travelled to rural South Africa and arrived in Ndawana, a Zulu/Xhosa village in the province of Eastern Cape that's built along a long dirt road.

Ndawana, population 3,800, has no electricity, plumbing or telephone network. Many villagers live in extreme poverty, and half of the residents between ages 18 and 40 are HIV positive. I went to Ndawana to work with Edzimkulu, an Edmonton-based non-governmental organization that helps children affected by AIDS, to help build a community centre for the people of Ndawana.

On my first day there, I was greeted warmly by a community development team, construction crews, the village chief and random passers-by. I also went to the Edzimkulu site, a 450-square-metre piece of land set aside for the centre by the chief.

The centre we built comprises a health clinic, a learning centre, a craft centre, a community kitchen, meeting rooms and a community garden. The site is where I spent most of my days – Monday to Friday, 7 a.m. to 4 p.m. – as architect and construction supervisor.

During the five months I was in Africa, I was continuously amazed.

Edzimkulu, which I discovered on the Internet, was conceived by a Canadian couple, Jim and Chris Newton, in their retirement to help fight the devastating AIDS virus.

Canadian volunteers, ranging in age from 21 to 87, have made huge efforts to work side by side with the people of Ndawana in an inspiring grassroots way so that villagers will have lasting leadership and enjoy ownership of the project. They focused on what was essential for the community in the short and the long term.

At the age of 23, I had skill, insight and technical experience that was actually helpful half way around the world to people of ages, nationality, religion and race far different than me.

After completing my first university degree, a bachelor's in architecture from McGill University, I didn't think I would have the opportunity to design and build a structure this early in my career. Moreover, I certainly didn't anticipate being able to do so in Africa using wheelbarrows, thatch, recycled materials and bricks made on-site with a team of 20 workers who spoke little, if any, English. Drawings and hand gestures proved to be essential, and remarkably effective, for communication.

Pictured above and below are workers on the building site for a new community centre in the South African village of Ndawana. At bottom right, architect Joanne Frisch, a McGill University graduate who designed the centre, supervises construction.

The residents of Ndawana, like millions of other Africans, live day to day without many of the amenities that are so easily accessible and so much a part of our lives in the Western world, including all manner of material goods, as well as education and health care.

Their lives are very different from our own.

For example, I saw African women carrying huge loads – a wooden sewing machine or chopped-up trees for fire wood on their heads. Men walk for hours – often barefoot and often in the dark of the early morning and evening – to get to work on farms or in neighbouring towns. For their labour, they are paid barely enough to cover the basic costs of shelter, food and clothing.

But despite their physical challenges, people have tremendous energy and spirit. Singing and dancing break out spontaneously everywhere – at home, at school, on the road and at work. On the building site where I was working, the roof crew would often bop around the rafters while keeping up a complex harmony in a traditional song.

I was inspired by the Edzimkulu project in Ndawana and remain so today. We were reaching way beyond to give to, and take, from one another.

To contribute in a positive way to building a sense of community – be it local, national or international – is to actualize the values of tikkun olam that we cherish so much.

For more on the Ndawana project, contact me at jojofrisch@hotmail.com.

Joanne Frisch is completing her master's degree in architecture at the University of Illinois at Chicago.

Where is God?

By RABBI MENDEL KAPLAN

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

In the latest anti-Semitic attacks there, a skinhead stabs and attempts to kill some Muscovite Jews whose sole sin is the desire to pray. Despite the remarkable rapport Russia's chief rabbi enjoys with the country's president, the Jewish community feels impelled to create its own self-defence apparatus. They can no longer rely on the state's protection.

On the brink of achieving nuclear capability, Iran's hatefully twisted president denies the Holocaust and threatens Israel's annihilation. The UN's unusually deliberate reaction is mild at best. In this international crisis of epic proportion, Israel alone feels the brunt of the pressure.

Despite its hollow promises, the ruling infrastructure of the Palestinian Authority does nothing to hinder the murderous activities of the terrorist organizations in its jurisdiction. Instead, they warmly welcome these groups onto the political stage and include them in the upcoming democratic process. The world says little or nothing in protest other than to emphasize that Israel must learn to be more "tolerant and accommodating."

The fashionable, politically correct and morally smug left readily acknowledges the European Holocaust by villifying Nazis and fascists, but refuses to call their new Islamic incarnation anything more than "freedom fighters."

Has anything really changed in 2,000 years? It seems that the Galut (Diaspora) odyssey, punctuated by the same, age-old pattern of anti-Semitism, continues. Why does God allow this to happen again and again?

The midrash (Bereishit Rabba 16) tells us that the spiritual origin of all exile is the biblical Egyptian exile. Accepting this premise means the Torah's narrative of the first Jewish bondage and exodus should offer us a clue.

In the second chapter of Exodus, the scripture tells us about a humble shepherd who sees a bush that is on fire but isn't burning. What ensues is a fateful meeting that will forever change the world's destiny. Moses meets God and is charged with redeeming his brethren and establishing a chosen people.

"When they ask me your name," queries a distraught Moses, "what shall I say to them?"

God's cryptic answer: "Tell them: I will be as I will be." Rashi expands the sentence by quoting the Talmud's words for clarification. "Imo Anochi betzara" (I will be with them in their present suffering just as I will be with them in their future suffering).

This enigmatic exchange begs for explanation. Why is Moses so sure that the people will ask for God's name? And why is the location of the Divine presence the answer?

In the winter of 1983, as Israel was suffering heavy casualties in Lebanon, the Lubavitcher Rebbe explained these verses in an emotionally charged address. A kernel of that moving, scholarly rumination goes like this: names are more than ID tags. Names define relationships. A person may be a child, sibling, spouse, parent or professional. The different names characterize and reveal those various persona.

"'Ma Shmo [what is His Name] – what type of strange God is this?' the people will ask. If He is omnipresent and cares for us, where has He been for the last 90 years of slavery, degradation and death? And what shall I tell them?" Moses demands.

God's answer: "Imo Anochi betzara – tell them I have been with them all along, I didn't forget or turn a blind eye. Whenever they suffered, I was in pain with them.

"My ways forever remain mysterious… there are some things humankind can never comprehend, but tell them that nonetheless I am not aloof."

The bush is on fire, but flames cannot consume it because God is in the fire. The Jewish nation is threatened with annihilation time and again, but it will never die because God is always with them. Then, now and forever.

Rabbi Kaplan is the founder and spiritual leader of Chabad@Flamingo in Thornhill, and serves as a chaplain of the York Regional Police.

Jewish podcasts, Part 3

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

What are you listening to on your iPod? If you have space to spare on your MP3 player, there is wonderful free Jewish content that you can download and enjoy anywhere. From practically any flavour of Israeli music to Jewish culture, the podcasts are waiting for you

When Israelis turn on the radio, do you think most of them are listening to Erev shel Shoshanim or Yerushalayim Shel Zahav? Then you're in for a surprise Those classics have their appeal, but like music lovers everywhere, Israelis have wide and varied tastes. That's why the Kol Cambridge – Music from Israel podcast is a great find. This weekly, two-hour, student-run show from England airs songs from various genre, including pop, rock, jazz, hip- hop, klezmer and chassidic – as well as some oldies thrown into the mix. The only thing these songs share in common is that they are all in Hebrew. The show's hosts are pleasant and knowledgeable and the Kol Cambridge website provides a playlist of songs aired, so you can always double-check what you're listening to. [http://tinyurl.com/ey3h8]

On Sameach Music presents everything from traditional boys' choir music to the sounds of the duo Dachs and Dov, and tunes from veterans Avraham Fried and Moshe Yess. This site is a showcase for Sameach Music, a large distributor of Jewish music, video and songbooks. The podcast is professionally done and never sounds like an extended commercial. [http://sameachmusicpodcast.libsyn.com/]

As you might gather from the title, don't expect to hear klezmer tunes on the Rock 'n' Roll Jew show. "The best podsafe rock 'n' roll from Israel and beyond" is hard-hitting and almost entirely in English. Producer David Jacobs features bands from Israel or with Jewish heritage as well as other bands that interest him. [www.rockandrolljew.com/]

The Oy Mendele! podcast does play some music but excels with its varied – and often provocative – look at Jewish culture. Hear the story of the Abayudaya Jews of Uganda, an interview with a Jewish filmmaker who is critical of the labour practices of Wal-Mart, and an "unorthodox, unauthorized history of the Jewish people and the Barbie doll." The podcast is based in Berkeley, Calif., and comes out every month or so. [www.fixler.com/blojsom/blog/default/Audio/]

Nextbook, "a gateway to Jewish literature, culture, and ideas," has created a podcast to complement its impressive website. I listened in on a fascinating interview with award-winning author and clinical professor of surgery at Yale, Sherwin Nuland, on his biography of Maimonides. There is a look at how organs, long associated with churches, became staples of synagogues of 19th-century Germany. And Fiona Rosenblum speaks about her young-adult novel, You Are SO Not Invited To My Bat Mitzvah! – and why the author never actually had a bat mitzvah herself. [www.nextbook.org/cultural/podcasts.html]

For more on books, check out the inaugural podcast of The Book of Life. That show is produced by Heidi Estrin, chair of the committee at the Association of Jewish Libraries that presents the award for the best in Jewish children's literature. [www.jewishbooks.blogspot.com/]

What is the quintessential Jewish beverage? Many people might answer wine. Or perhaps a shot of shnapps or vodka. But Brooklyn's Barry Joseph has no doubts it's seltzer. Joseph, the self-proclaimed Effervescent Jew, has created a blog and a podcast titled Give Me Seltzer. There are interviews about the history of the drink, a look at its current popularity around the world, comedy from Allan Sherman and a marvellous theme song sung to the Beatles' Helter Skelter. [www.givemeseltzer.com/]

And the Jewish and Israeli content? It's there – like the video podcast that includes a clip from the 1966 film Cast a Giant Shadow. Frank Sinatra, flying on behalf of the fledgling Israeli air force during the 1948 War of Independence, bombards Egyptian troops with his weapon of choice – seltzer bottles. Why? According to the film, the poorly equipped Israeli army used seltzer bottles to scare the enemy because they made a lot of noise as they dropped.

Letters to a Buddhist Jew

By KYLE GORDON
CJN Intern

A Zen Jew struggling to resolve these two identities sought counsel and direction from South African-born physician and author Rabbi Akiva Tatz.

Letters to a Buddhist Jew documents the conversations between David Gottlieb and Rabbi Tatz. They discussed the book in front of a packed audience at the Minsker Shul last week.

Gottlieb's journey into other traditions started late in life. He began learning about Buddhism after marrying his wife, a cantor at a Reform synagogue.

While a member of a Conservative synagogue in Chicago, Gottlieb did not feel a connection with Judaism.

"If this was Judaism, I didn't get it," he said.

It was this realization that encouraged Gottlieb to begin meditation at a Zen Buddhist centre and accept the basic Buddhist precepts, similar to the Ten Commandments, as a code of living.

"My wife was beside herself. She thought this was being unfaithful," Gottlieb said.

Soon after beginning meditation, Gottlieb brought his wife, Galit, to see the centre and meet his teacher.

He read a passage from his book about this encounter.

"'Why are there statues everywhere?' my wife asks."

"'Well,' my meditation teacher says, 'the statues of the Buddha are there as reminders of the essence of what we call Buddha nature. They represent a certain kind of centred aware, solid presence that we each have and can cultivate within ourselves.'"

"'In my religion,' my wife says acidly, 'we call that idol worship. It's strictly forbidden.'"

As Galit's discomfort with his Buddhism grew, Gottlieb decided to contact Rabbi Tatz, a Torah scholar and lecturer based in London, England, to discuss the obstacles that frustrated his approach to and observance of Judaism, he said.

In 2003, Gottlieb sent Rabbi Tatz 15 questions in an e-mail, titled "A Jewish Buddhist's complaints about Judaism and comparisons of Judaism with Zen."

The e-mail and the increasing number of Jews who are drawn to eastern religions intrigued Rabbi Tatz and he began a two-year correspondence with Gottlieb.

In his address, Rabbi Tatz attempted to explain the concept of idolatry. He said that Buddhist Jews do not see the statue of Buddha, in a Zen centre, as an idol.

"It is obviously much deeper than that," said Rabbi Tatz. Instead, they see it as a meditation aid representing the calm self.

According to Rabbi Tatz, idolatry is the idea of relating to the channels that bring down energy into the world rather than to the supernatural source of all existence.

Through Buddhist meditation, the encouragement of his wife and her desire for a Jewish home, and the assistance of Rabbi Tatz, Gottlieb turned away from Buddhism. He came to feel strongly that he was and always would be a Jew.

"I found my Jewish soul through meditation. It made me a better Jew, in the end," Gottlieb said.

Jewish organizations seek Foundation expertise

Community organizations benefit from partnership with the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto

By MARGI OKSNER
UJA Federation

UJA Federation of Hamilton has become Canada's first Jewish Federation to transfer responsibility for its endowment fund assets to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, the planned giving arm of Toronto's UJA Federation. In so doing, Hamilton's Federation officials are confident that its endowment fund will be the best managed in Canada.

Hamilton UJA Federation president, Leslie Lasky, believes that the transfer of his city's Legacy Endowment Fund to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto will provide greater incentive for the fund to grow.

"Successful endowment fund programs are a key mechanism used throughout North America to ensure the future financial security of Jewish institutions," says Lasky. "Our Legacy Endowment Fund will now benefit from the investment and management expertise of the largest Jewish community endowment program in Canada. This, in turn, will go a long way toward ensuring the financial viability of every agency and program currently receiving Hamilton Federation's funding. I am convinced this will make a major difference in our future success."

Gerald Fisher, executive director of Hamilton's Federation shares Lasky's positive outlook. "This new arrangement with the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto will make it possible for us to re-institute an ongoing endowment fund campaign with the assistance of one of the largest and most successful endowment funds in Canada. This puts us in a very strong position to go forward."

Many other organizations have already entrusted the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto with the management of their endowment funds. These partnerships include: Bialik Hebrew Day School, Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park, Miles Nadal JCC, the Israel Cancer Research Fund and JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto, just to name a few.

"By utilizing the outstanding community resource of the Jewish Foundation, JIAS's money is being invested wisely, in a very cost effective manner and its interests are being protected by a team of experts who understand the community and JIAS's needs." says Don Bennett, JIAS treasurer.

Partnership creates much-needed respite care program at Miles Nadal JCC

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

When Sandy Keshen, executive director of the Reena Foundation, was looking for a centralized location to provide services to families living south of Lawrence Avenue, she contacted the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation's endowment arm. A partnership was quickly established between Reena, the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and a generous Foundation donor.

The result of that fortuitous relationship is the Miles Nadal Social Club, which, since its inception in September, provides 16 families with some much needed respite care. Catering to developmentally delayed children and young adults by providing a meaningful Sunday afternoon program to build on their social and physical skills, the Social Club also enables parents to drop their youngsters off at the Nadal JCC confident that they will be receiving first-rate care, while the parents take advantage of some quality time for themselves.

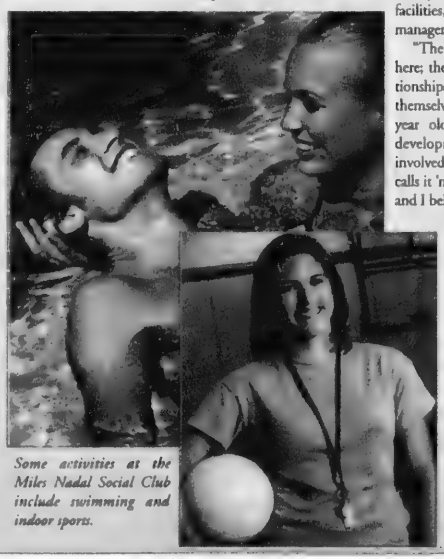
The Howard and Donna Winick Philanthropic Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto provided the finances needed to get the program rolling with a generous donation of $10,000 in memory of Helen Unger.

"We initiated this program for parents who live further south, parents who wanted to be able to take advantage of this type of initiative, without having to schlep their kids up to the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre in Thornhill," says Keshen. "I contacted Ellen Cole, the executive director at the Miles Nadal JCC and she was extremely receptive and has been tremendous, as has the entire staff there."

Currently in its winter session, the Miles Nadal Social Club – for clients from two age groups, 8 to 13 and 14 to 21 - provides aquatics, sports, art, drama, music, community living skills, use of community facilities, public transportation, money management and more.

"The youngsters feel so comfortable here; they make friends, establish relationships, and make a real social life for themselves," says Keshen. "I have a 10 year old grandchild myself who is developmentally delayed and he's involved with Reena in Thornhill. He calls it 'my place where my friends are,' and I believe the kids at the Nadal JCC will feel the same way. It's wonderful to see the looks on their faces when they greet one another. It's tremendous to see this incredible response to a population that had previously been so isolated."

"We were delighted to be approached for this program because it gave us the opportunity to help create such a valuable partnership," says Cole. "It's just been a tremendous experience for all of us, the clients, the staff – it's a total win-win scenario."



Some activities at the Miles Nadal Social Club include swimming and indoor sports.

Jewish Foundation produces above average returns

Investment return of managed portfolio reaches 13.4%

By DANIEL HOROWITZ & MARGI OKSNER
UJA Federation

The average rate of return on the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's investments at 13.4% for 2004-2005 increased by nearly three percent from the previous year, when it was 10.5%. To put this into perspective, the CPP (Canada Pension Plan) reserve fund assets showed a rate of return of 8.5% in the same year.

"We were very fortunate last year," says 2004 Investment Committee chair Ira Gluskin. "With a first rate committee and conservative managers, our job was to achieve absolute rates of return and not worry about relative rates of return. Most of the money was invested in Canada, which is the best of any market around the world."

Since its inception, the assests of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – UJA Federation's planned giving arm and Jewish Toronto's philanthropic resource centre – have grown from $21.2 million in 1994 to over $134 million today. This rapid growth has allowed the distribution of over $8.5 million in 2005 to more than 135 organizations.

"From both an investment and administrative point of view, the Foundation is very attractive," says Elizabeth Wolfe, chair, Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

"On a day-to-day basis, the Jewish Foundation offers donors personalized support by providing customized information and identifying funding opportunities in specific areas of interest; by facilitating the grant making process from proposal to funding to evaluation; and by providing timely financial reporting," says Carol Kassel, Jewish Foundation's vice president, Planned Giving and Endowments. "We develop tremendous partnerships between our donors and the beneficiaries who rely on the support of the community. Our mandate is to provide leadership in identifying and addressing community needs, and assisting donors in achieving their philanthropic objectives. I believe that no other organization in Toronto can fulfill this role as effectively."

"There are so many options, so many organizations knocking on doors looking for donations, that people often need a filter," says Wolfe. "That's why so many look to the Foundation now, because of our expertise and our international accessibility. Our professionals have the resources to assess and evaluate the priorities, the needs in the community and the wishes of the donor. That partnership defines today's new philanthropy."

The growth in popularity of the Foundation can also be attributed to accountability, essential for today's sophisticated donor.

"We offer accountability in a variety of areas," says Wolfe. "The Foundation assures donors that grants from their funds are being applied to the projects they have identified to be supported. But more than that, the Foundation also takes on all the administration related to the management and distribution of the funds which is a huge advantage for donors."

According to Wolfe, another attractive benefit of dealing with the Foundation is that it is "almost impossible for an individual to duplicate the level of expertise offered by our investment committee and our professional administrators."

"UJA Federation is the heart and the soul of our Jewish community and through its endowment arm, the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, we established a donor advised fund," says fundholder Ab Flatt. "The money is being directed to a number of important initiatives, helping to ensure the future of our vibrant Jewish community."

"The impact of the dollars we distributed for social services, education, assisting the vulnerable and, of course, supporting many initiatives in Israel is tremendous. We are very proud of our achievements and of our ability to make charitable giving easy and rewarding," remarks Wolfe.

Better climate dawning for stock donations

By JAMIE GOLOMBEK
UJA Federation

Assuming the recently-elected Conservatives follow-up on their pre-election promise to eliminate the capital gains tax on donations of listed shares to a registered Canadian charity, this new rule should provide a huge impetus for a flood of sizable stock donations in 2006. Before discussing the Conservatives' proposal, let's review the basic donation credit rule.

Jamie Golombek

The Donation Credit

Donations to a registered charity in Canada are eligible for the donation tax credit. For the first $200 of donations made by an individual in the year, the federal donation credit is 16 percent of the amount given.

The Ontario provincial credit is an additional 6 percent, for a combined total credit of approximately 22 percent. In other words, when you file your tax return, you would be entitled to about $44 back from the first $200 of annual donations.

But it gets even better. Once you've made at least $200 of donations in any year, the donation credit jumps to 29 percent federally, plus between 11 and 18 percent provincially, depending on your income tax bracket and whether you are subject to the Ontario high-income surtaxes.

So, for donations in excess of the first $200, you would get back, at a minimum, 40 percent of the amount you donate. Given that the donations are in the form of tax credits (a credit is a reduction of tax owing) as opposed to tax deductions (a reduction of taxable income), the credits are essentially worth the same for low-, middle- and high income earners (ignoring the effect of the Ontario surtax).

The Conservative Proposal

The Conservative proposal to eliminate the capital gains tax on donations of appreciated publicly traded stock to charity, which was also endorsed by the Liberals, will surely be a windfall for philanthropy in the community. The current inclusion rate on donations of such stock is 25 percent.

For example, let's assume that a donor, who currently owns $100,000 of publicly-traded stock that he purchased many years ago for $20,000, is considering a donation of these shares to charity. If he simply sold the shares first, he would realize a capital gain of $80,000 and pay tax of about $18,000 on the gain, assuming a top marginal rate of about 45 percent.

Under the Conservative proposal, if he donates the shares directly to charity, this $18,000 of capital gains tax will be eliminated and he would still be entitled to his full tax receipt for the $100,000 contributed.

Finally, keep in mind that this proposal is not yet law so be sure to get some professional advice to ensure that this is passed before assuming it's a done deal.

Jamie Golombek is vice president, Taxation & Estate Planning at AIM Trimark Investments in Toronto and a member of the Jewish Foundation's Professional Advisory Committee.

Top money manager leads investment committee

Catherine (Kiki) Delaney, president of investment counselling firm C.A. Delaney Capital Management Ltd., is the new chair of the Investment Committee at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, following in the footsteps of former chairs Ira Gluskin and Austin Beutel.

"The Jewish Foundation and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto are such tremendous organizations and it is so important to give back to the community," says Delaney. "I was flattered to be asked to chair a committee that is populated by a group of people, each of whom is both an expert and a success in his or her own field and totally motivated and committed to sharing their knowledge."

Delaney says her primary goal is to produce above average returns with below average volatility by tapping into the knowledge base of the top ranking specialists who are members of this committee. "They bring such varying expertise to the table," says Delaney.

Catherine (Kiki) Delaney

The Foundation's return on investment for the 2004-2005 fiscal year was 13.4%.

Delaney sees the highest priority of the Investment Committee as preserving capital of over $134 million in assets held by the Jewish Foundation. "These assets comprise the legacy and endowment funds of many donors in support of our Jewish community and we want to ensure they are there in perpetuity," she says.

"I'm following two of the smartest money managers in Canada," adds Delaney. "I would never presume to change the outstandingly successful policies they put into motion. However, every investment counselor has his or her predisposition. With my equity bias, over time and when it is appropriate, I would like to see the Foundation develop a policy that reflects a high equity proportion."

PA election puts Hamas under a microscope

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As of this writing, the results of the Jan. 25 Palestinian elections seem to indicate that Hamas has handily beaten Fatah and will likely form the next government. Meanwhile, most of the coverage in the run-up to the election focused on Hamas. While some reporters seemed to buy in to the new, "moderate" Hamas, others were more skeptical, portraying Hamas as a terrorist organization committed to Israel's destruction.

In "Hamas's road to politics" (Toronto Star, Jan. 23) Olivia Ward wrote that the Hamas covenant "ruled out any compromise with Israel, declared all of Palestine a Muslim state and announced a holy war against the Jewish state." Yet, without examining the implications of these statements, Ward said that Hamas "may be the principal partner for negotiations for the future of Middle East peace."

In the Globe and Mail ("Defusing Hamas," Jan. 21), Mark MacKinnon accurately predicted that "Hamas is on the verge of handing the ruling Fatah party a lashing that could radically alter the Palestinian political landscape and derail prospects of a peace settlement with Israel."

But MacKinnon was off the mark in claiming that Hamas insists on using violence "to end Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza." Hamas's goal, in fact, is to "liberate" all of historic Palestine – including Israel.

There are many quotes from Hamas leaders such as Mahmoud al-Zahar who, prior to the election, declared outright: "Hamas will not negotiate with Israeli occupiers and will not recognize Israel's appropriation of a single inch of our land" (UPI, Jan. 19). By "our land" al-Zahar is including Israel along with the West Bank and Gaza – everything from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan River.

What journalists should consider is how an organization committed to the destruction of a UN-member state can ever be thought of as a possible partner for future negotiations.

On NBC News (Jan. 24), Martin Fletcher profiled a female Hamas candidate who was proud that three of her sons were "martyred" in terrorist attacks against Israel. Fletcher asked her: "Standing for Parliament means that's an end to the military struggle, doesn't it? Democracy means no more terrorism?"

Her answer: "No, our strategy is to continue with military action. It is parallel: the political plan and the jihad plan."

Fletcher's conclusion summarized what's at stake: "Fatah in the present government agrees to a Palestinian state alongside Israel, while Hamas wants a Palestinian state instead of Israel."

On The National (CBC, Jan 24), Adrienne Arsenault described how Hamas was campaigning on being able to deliver social services and run a "clean" government, as opposed to the corruption and inefficiency of Fatah. Arsenault said: "Its carefully managed campaign stresses charity work. But this is not a gentler Hamas. Its campaign ads make its values clear: Destroy Israel and hang on to 'the weapon.'"

Arsenault interviewed Hamas's No. 2 candidate, Sheikh Abu Tir. Described by Bradley Burston in Ha'aretz as the "poster boy" for the moderate face of Hamas, Abu Tir contradicted this image, telling Arsenault: "Palestine is occupied since 1948. This is our right to fight," meaning that the armed struggle must continue until all of Palestine is liberated.

Statements such as this show just how unsuccessful Hamas's efforts to soften its radical image in the West are likely to be. In "Hamas launches media war," (Toronto Star, Jan. 21), Mitch Potter wrote about the lengths to which Hamas has gone to "rebrand" itself, going so far as to hire Ramallah-based media consultant Nashat Aqtash, paying him $180,000 (US) for "a month-long campaign leading up to [last week's] Parliamentary elections."

The Canadian federal election closely preceded the Palestinian election, which means the new government in Ottawa might immediately face a Middle East issue, a topic explored by Anna Morgan in the Toronto Star ("Elections here and there pose a Mideast dilemma," Jan. 22). Morgan wrote: "If Hamas wins, the new Canadian government will have to confront the dilemma of how to deal with democratically elected candidates committed to terrorism."

Hamilton ceremony honours survivors

HAMILTON — More than 300 people came to the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Pavilion at the Art Gallery of Hamilton to pay tribute to local Holocaust survivors on the United Nations International Day of Commemoration in Memory of the Victims of the Holocaust last Friday.

The City of Hamilton marked the occasion with a dignified and deeply moving program that reached across all ethnic, racial and religious lines.

The event was sponsored by the Hamilton chapter of the Canadian United Nations Association, the City of Hamilton, the Hamilton Jewish Federation, the Hamilton Culture of Peace Network, Hamilton Police Services, the Strengthening Hamilton Community Initiative and the Hamilton Interfaith Group. The public and separate-school boards of the Hamilton-Wentworth District also participated.

Dan McLean of CHTV was the moderator of the event and guest speakers included Hamilton Mayor Larry Di Ianni; Hamilton Centre MP David Christopherson; president of the United Nations Association of Canada, Kate White; Hamilton MPP Maria Bountrogianni; Sandra Wilson of Hamilton Police Services and Rabbi Daniel Green of Adas Israel Synagogue.

Performances were given by Jack Mendelsohn, principal cellist of the Hamilton Philharmonic, and the Kehila Community Day School Children's Choir. Grade 8 students from the Hamilton Hebrew Academy served as ushers for the dignitaries and Holocaust survivors attending.

In what was the most moving element of the commemoration, representatives of six different faith and cultural groups, Muslim, Hindu, Bahai, First Nations, Buddhist and Rwandan, each read a biography of a local Hamilton survivor. After each reading, the survivor and his or her family were invited to place a stone in memory of one million of the six million Jewish Holocaust victims on top of a pillar.

The event was organized in response to a UN resolution, passed on Nov. 1, 2005, calling for an "international Day of Commemoration to honour victims of the Holocaust." The resolution "rejects any denial of the Holocaust as a historical event, in whole or in part"; "condemns without reserve all manifestations of religious intolerance, incitement, harassment or violence based on ethnic origin or religious beliefs"; and "calls upon civil society to mobilize for Holocaust education and remembrance, in order to help prevent future acts of genocide."

Initiated by Israel and drafted by Australia, the United States, Canada and Russia, it was the first resolution ever put forward by Israel at the UN. The resolution was cosponsored by 104 countries and passed by consensus.

Madeleine Levy of the Hamilton Interfaith Group said that "since the events of 9/11, the City of Hamilton has provided every ethnic, cultural and religious group an unparalleled opportunity to come together and to develop much greater awareness and sensitivity to each other."

She said that the event was of deep personal significance to her and her family because so many of her relatives were lost in Romania during the war.

CIC commends Harper

However, "if institutions committed to terrorism are playing a role in the Palestinian state, whether elected or not, that's an indication to me that the road to democracy has not been travelled very far."

Harper declined to say whether his government would continue to support Palestinians under Hamas. Under the Liberals, Canadian aid to the Palestinian Authority has totalled $310 million since 1993.

Critics of the Liberals have complained that Ottawa has never confirmed that the Palestinian leadership was doing what the aid has been contingent on, namely, disarming Palestinian terrorists and ending incitement in textbooks and the glorification of suicide bombers.

The Canada-Israel Committee commended Harper's remarks.

"With [his] comment, Mr. Harper has aligned himself with the international consensus as expressed by numerous world leaders throughout the course of the day," stated Marc Gold, the CIC's national chair.

Palestinians "have a democratic right to choose their leadership," Gold went on, "but they must accept the consequences of those choices. As long as Hamas supports terrorism, it cannot be a partner for peace. Israel cannot be expected to negotiate with a party that calls for its destruction and pursues a program of terror to achieve its political objectives."

He said Israel will continue "to advance the cause of peace independently."

The Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies also applauded Harper.

"We now call on [Harper] to ensure that Canada suspend all financing and contacts with a government declared by this country as a terrorist group," stated the Friends' director of national affairs, Leo Adler.

In a telephone interview from Israel with the Toronto Star, B'nai Brith Canada executive vice-president Frank Dimant expressed hope that Harper would appoint Stockwell Day, known for his pro-Israel views, as foreign affairs minister.

The victory by Hamas represents "a setback for Palestinian and Israeli moderates seeking a negotiated solution to the conflict, but it should not serve as a pretext for Israeli hardliners to oppose further steps to end the occupation," said the Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

Canadians apathetic about terrorism, says general

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The highest ranking Jewish officer in the Canadian Forces warned that Canadians are "sleepwalking" in the face of the potential threat of international terrorism on this country's soil.

This has become "a dangerous world – more so than in the recent past – but Canadians are generally unaware of the hazards and done little about them," Maj.-Gen. Ed Fitch told a Congregation Shaar Hashomayim audience last week.

"I'm not here to frighten you, just alert you," he said.

Fitch, a Montreal native who grew up in Shaar Hashomayim, said that "our enemies are looking to exploit what they see as the weaknesses in Western civilization: our belief in the sanctity of life, our open society, democracy, our adherence to the Geneva Conventions.

"Their greatest delight is the apathy of our population."

Avoiding the word 'terrorist," he described these enemies as "by and large, anarchists, criminals and thugs," who are lightly armed, relying mainly on a sophisticated use of explosives, and with minimal infrastructure such as bases and airfields.

"Yet they are capable of bringing war close to us," he said.

"Are the threats that have been made against Canada credible? You can decide for yourself. Because we have not been attacked yet is no reason we won't be."

Canada's military is being put on an operational footing abroad and at home, he said. "The chief of defence staff has said that Canada itself has become a theatre of operation… We are preparing to fight an undeclared war."

Similarly, the RCMP, CSIS and the border and immigration services have been put on the ready, Fitch said.

"But we don't know if it is enough. No one can give you a guarantee on security."

Internationally, Canada's goal is to "stop the instability before it is sent to Canada." During this month and next, Canadian troops in Afghanistan will be increased from 600 to 2,000, he said.

"This is not the peacekeeping that we have been so good at… This is a Taliban hunting.".

Fitch stressed it's a "myth" that our troops are being sent into operations poorly equipped. "In Kandahar, of all the national contingents, including the U.S., none are better equipped… It is hurtful to our troops to open the papers and read that they are poorly equipped. It's demoralizing."

What Fitch does find "pitiful" is the lack of civil planning for a possible attack at home.

He said every Canadian can contribute by being alert to their surroundings. "Don't be apathetic. The enemy will be delighted. Don't panic. This is, in many respects, a psychological war."

He advised each person to be aware of their neighbourhoods, the routes they regularly travel, the stores they frequent.

"Observe any anomalies and report them. You are going to notice them before others, would because it's your habitual area."

He said everyone should consider what skills they have that might be mobilized in the event of an emergency. "The police and fire departments, even the armed forces, may not be enough when it happens.

"Shake off the sleep. Walk aware and alert. Prepare to contribute, in no matter what small way, the variety of skills you have. If we are strong, the democracies will prevail against this threat."

He also urged those present to call upon the government to "take effective measures" against terrorism, "not just window-dressing."

Fitch, who has served for 39 years, is currently project manager of "land force reserve restructure," based at National Defence Headquarters in Ottawa.

Born in Montreal in 1949, he graduated from the Royal Military College in Kingston in 1971 with a degree in civil engineering.

He has spent most of his career in Canada, but did a one-year tour in the former Yugoslavia, for which he was awarded the Meritorious Service Medal. He was promoted to his present rank in December 2001.

Fitch guessed there are probably a "few hundred" Jews in the Canadian forces today. The religion of service personnel is confidential, known only by the chaplain-general.

Fitch keeps kosher at home and on the job as much as possible. Kosher rations have been available in the field since the late 1990s, but not in garrison, he said. "I've eaten a lot of peanut butter sandwiches."

Fitch's father Burton served in World War II, and his uncle, his father's brother Max, was a military medical officer for 30 years.

One of Fitch's great-grandfathers also served in the Austrian army before the family came to Canada.

TEACHERS HONOURED: A standing-room-only-crowd of parents, students, colleagues, alumni and parents of alumni gathered Jan. 22 at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation to pay tribute to three faculty members of Yeshivat Or Chaim-Ulpanat Orot Girls School who are retiring. Brenda Freedman, seated, along with Cordelia Oliver, standing left, and Marsha Razin have taught for a combined total of more than 100 years at the schools.

Dignitaries recall Holocaust at CJC event

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — To mark the commemoration of the first annual United Nations International Day of Holocaust Remembrance, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) hosted a luncheon reception for members of the diplomatic corps and representatives of local Jewish organizations.

Eric Vernon, CJC's director of government relations, welcomed Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker and Polish Ambassador Piotr Ogrodzinsky, as well as Sabine Sparwasser, charge d'affaires of the German embassy.

"We pay tribute to the United Nations for adopting the motion of the State of Israel to declare Jan. 27 as the International Day of Holocaust Remembrance to ponder both the uniqueness of the Holocaust in its nature and dimensions and the universality of its lessons and messages," Vernon said, noting that Jan. 27 was chosen because it was the day that Auschwitz was liberated in 1945.

Vernon welcomed representatives of three of the four countries that co-sponsored Israel's UN motion to establish the memorial day: Wendy Drukier, deputy head of the UN desk at Foreign Affairs Canada; Sergey Petrov of the Russian Embassy; and Lisa Wishman, vice-consul at the American Embassy. Vernon noted that the fourth co-sponsor, Australia, was celebrating its National Day, and its representatives could not attend.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka said with irony that he would be leaving the gathering to address a Kiwanis group on the topic, "Is anti-Semitism making a comeback?"

Emphasizing the timeliness of the UN resolution, Rabbi Bulka said, "It comes also at a time when we are acutely aware of some of the horrible, vitriolic statements coming out of Iran and its president," referring to recent statements by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad that Israel should be "wiped off the map."

Rabbi Bulka expressed hope that the United Nations will carry out its mandate and urge member nations to include Holocaust teaching in their educational institutions.

Baker said he was "been involved indirectly in drafting the resolution that was adopted and the many drafts that were proposed and had to be changed, and in negotiations with other countries that do not recognize the State of Israel." He added that this type of resolution should have been passed 60 years ago, but he nonetheless expressed satisfaction that it was passed.

"This being said, within a month or two months of this being adopted by the [UN General Assembly], we find ourselves in the situation that the newly elected president of Iran… claiming that the Holocaust was a myth and convening an international conference on Holocaust denial," Baker said.

"The question is whether or not the international community is prepared to go a step further and to do something practical, whether in the UN or the G-8 or in other international contexts, to act responsibly, in a serious and firm way, against this type of incitement to genocide."

David Shentow and Ellie Bollegraf, as well as Rubin Friedman, the child of Holocaust survivors, represented survivors.

Also in attendance were David Pratt of Canadian Red Cross Society, Gen. Edward Fitch of the Canadian Forces, Sigurd Pacher of the Austrian Embassy and Gaorge Zaharea of the Romanian Embassy.

PAPER MAKERS: Noa Cowley, a Grade 1 student at the Toronto Heschel School, and her teacher Marylin Berman made paper recently as part of a social and environmental studies unit on matter and material. The kids created handmade recycled paper out of old paper using ancient techniques and modern equipment.

Obituary

Andrea Bronfman mourned in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Andrea Bronfman is being remembered in Montreal, where she lived for 30 years, as a woman who approached whatever cause she espoused with passion and determination.

The news of Bronfman's accidental death on Jan. 23 in New York at age 60 shocked the Montreal Jewish community, where many still remember her best as a founder of the Group of 35, a pioneering organization of younger women who tirelessly campaigned for the emigration of Soviet Jewry, in the 1970s and early '80s.

Andrea Bronfman

"She was brave and extremely creative, yet self-effacing," said Manny Batshaw, who was her husband Charles Bronfman's adviser on Jewish affairs for 17 years.

"She put herself totally into whatever she took on. Nothing, but nothing, stood in her way. And she was absolutely insistent upon excellence, and was most unhappy with anything less. She wouldn't say so verbally, she never raised her voice, but you could see it in her facial expression," he said.

Group of 35 member Carolyn Steinman recalled:"She had great fortitude. When she believed in something, she got down to the nitty-gritty. Nothing was too difficult for her; I remember her getting down on the floor and painting signs [for the group's demonstrations]. I really admired her.

"Some said she was a tough cookie, but she was also charming and pleasant."

Bronfman was buried on Friday on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem.

She died in hospital hours after being struck by a vehicle while walking her beloved dog Yoffi early in the morning near her Fifth Avenue apartment in Manhattan.

A petite, dark-haired woman, Bronfman, then known as Andy Cohen, was at the forefront of countless pre-glasnost vigils outside the Soviet consulate, then a mysterious and forbidding place on du Musée Avenue, often in the worst of weather and sometimes overnight.

Batshaw said the image most etched in his memory is of Bronfman standing on top of a panel truck shouting through a bullhorn "Let my people go."

"It was such a contrast to her otherwise self-effacing way. She liked to work in the background. Hers was a quiet leadership," Batshaw said.

"She was very hands-on," remembered Lily Frank, who met Bronfman through the Group of 35."She knew what she wanted and went for it. And she never tolerated fools easily."

Bronfman's biggest project in Canada was A Coat of Many Colours: Two Centuries of Jewish Life in Canada, which produced a film, book and an exhibition that premiered in 1990 at the Canadian Museum of Civilization, then travelled across Canada, and to New York and Israel.

Her 1982 marriage to Charles Bronfman, then the Montreal head of the Seagram's liquor corporation – a second marriage for both – was unusually compatible, observers say.

She came from a strongly Zionist background. Her late parents, Hyam and New York-born Doris Morrison, were leaders of the British Jewish community who lived part of the year in Jerusalem. Andrea expanded Charles's interest in Israel and the arts, moving him toward an activist style of philanthropy.

"They worked together as a team. They had the same mindset, the desire to do good for people. Charles is going to be lost without her," said longtime friend Martin Levine, who attended Bronfman's funeral at Manhattan's historic B'nai Jeshurun Synagogue on Jan. 25.

Levine described the funeral, attended by close to 1,500, including former U.S. president Bill Clinton, as a scene of "total sadness and sense of loss."

Born in London in 1945, Bronfman emigrated to Montreal soon after her first marriage to David Cohen in 1969, joining her older sister Marcia (Kappy) Flanders here.

She and Charles moved to New York in 1998, after dividing their time between that city and Montreal for some years. They also had homes in Jerusalem and Palm Beach, Fla. In 2003, she and Charles were named honorary citizens of Jerusalem, where they lived three months of the year, the first North American Jews to receive this honour.

She was co-chair of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies (ACBP), founded in 1998, which awards millions in grants annually to endeavours aimed at strengthening Jewish identity, especially among youth, as well as the arts and education in general. She and her husband were co-founders six years ago of birthright israel, a popular program that offers Jewish young people free organized trips to Israel. Almost 100,000 youths have participated to date.

"There was an undeniable force that seemed to emanate from Andy and make good things happen for many, many people," said Jeffrey Solomon, president of ACBP.

Among the recipient of ACBP funding in Canada are the Historica Foundation, which encourages young people to learn Canadian history and creates the televised Heritage Minutes; the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada; the National Gallery of Canada for the purchase of Canadian art; the University of Toronto, to establish a chair in Israeli studies; and scholarships for the Canadian Gene Cure Foundation to encourage more students to enter the field of genetics.

Bronfman was also founder and deputy chair of the Gift of New York, which donated tickets to cultural and sports events in New York to bereaved relatives of the 9/11 terrorist attacks as a gesture of solace. By its conclusion in the spring of 2003, 12,000 families had benefited.

In 2003, she founded the Association for Israel's Decorative Arts, with the mission of exposing Israeli artists to North American galleries and collectors. On her 60th birthday, Charles established the Andrea M. Bronfman Prize for the Arts, affectionately referred to as The Andy, to honour his wife's lifelong love of the arts and to showcase Israeli decorative artists.

In a 2002 interview with the New York Times, Bronfman explained that her grief over the recent death of a close friend of 35 years in a traffic accident in India gave her a sense of what the families of the 9/11 victims were suffering.

"I can feel it in my fingertips," she said. "Just what happens to people's worlds when you have a sudden tragedy; how many people need looking after who are left behind, in so many ways. Each person needs something different. It takes a lot of energy to come back into an everyday life."

Cotler speaks to law students

OTTAWA — If we don't get involved in the larger issues of human rights then we will diminish ourselves as Jews, MP Irwin Cotler recently told Jewish law students prior to the federal election.

Speaking at the 19th annual conference of the Canadian Jewish Law Students Association, Cotler urged students to take the struggle against injustice into their own hands.

Citing the landmark case of James Keegstra, in which the Supreme Court condemned hate speech, Cotler said that one of the deciding factors in the judgment came as the result of a factum that he filed with the assistance of a McGill law student.

He also urged students to use the Canadian government's recent designation of a Raoul Wallenberg Day and a Holocaust Remembrance Day as organizing points for days of reflection, learning, and inspiration.

When he spoke of what he called "a silent tsunami" in Africa, and "genocide" in Darfur, Cotler's passion resonated most strongly. "We are witnessing a silent tsunami in Africa every week. Between now and next Shabbat, 130,000 people will die in Africa. Do you hear anything about it [in the media]?"

Using statistics on the pervasiveness of poverty and mass atrocity in Africa, Cotler said, "We need students to sound the alarm. Unlike politicians, students can speak with a moral voice that will be respected. You should raise your voices because society is so cynical these days that if a politician speaks about Darfur they'll say 'He's manipulating the issue for political advantage'."

Cotler said he would provide conference organizers with a 12-point action plan for law students looking to make a difference on Darfur, which will be put on the organization's website.

But he warned that being involved in a cause mustn't be an exercise in "cocktail advocacy, where you go to a demonstration once a year and say 'I've done my thing for the cause.'"

Among speakers at the conference were Ontario Court of Appeal Justice Marc Rosenberg, Israel Ambassador Alan Baker, Lawrence Bergman, Jonathan Herman, Jack Silverstone, Elliot Lifson, Sara Saber Freedman and former Liberal MP Herb Gray.

U.S. students visit Hadera

A group of 20 American university students have returned from a visit they made last month to Hadera, Israel, where they visited the site of a suicide bombing that killed six Israelis and injured many more.

Aside from visiting the Barzilai Falafel stand in the Hadera market, where a suicide detonated himself this past October, the students also visited the Hillel Yaffe Hospital, where many Israelis are still recovering from that and other bombings.

The student leadership mission to Israel was organized by the Zionist Organization of America, (ZOA) in partnership with Chabad's Terror Victims Project, a group of 230 Chabad centres that offers emotional and financial support to victims of terror.

NOW attracts Jewish students from across Canada

'Our No. 1 goal is to light a flame under these students and to re-energize them'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

The 500 Jewish students who did not attend the recent Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) NOW weekend in Montreal were more significant in a way than the 350 who did participate, conference organizers say.

CFJS had to turn down that number of wannabe participants – an indication, they say, of the new level of resolve among increasing numbers of Canadian Jewish university students to work together as a dynamic whole and be involved in Jewish campus life in their local communities.

"That's key," said CFJS president Gary Diamond. "We will be a success nationally only if we are a success locally."

Success is something the fledgling organization seems to be achieving in small steps only two years since it was founded January 2004 to "empower the Canadian Jewish student community."

Its terms of reference include being the voice of Jewish students, convening and uniting students, leadership development, Canadian Jewish identity development and national communication – sharing resources across the country.

CFJS is also the Canadian representative of the World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS).

Last year, CFJS's first conference – also in Montreal – was called ONE, to signify Jewish student solidarity as Jews and as students. This year's name, NOW, was chosen to suggest that there is no better time for Jewish students to affirm themselves than "right here, right now."

Is some respects, Diamond said, CFJS is a successor – hopefully, a more durable one – to Network, a national Jewish student umbrella body that fizzled out of existence some years ago.

Diamond, 23, is a student at the University of Western Ontario, one of 30 campuses across Canada represented at the Jan. 19 to 22 conference. Participants came from Halifax, Kingston, Ottawa, London, Toronto, Hamilton, Kitchener-Waterloo, Windsor-Trent, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary, Saskatoon and other centres.

"It's been an incredible weekend," said Sara Berger, 21, vice-president of programming for CFJS, who co-chaired the NOW conference with 20-year-old McGill University political science student Jonathan Katz.

A fourth-year political science student at Queen's University, Berger estimated that only about 10 per cent of the 32,000 Jewish students at university campuses across the country are involved in a Jewish way, which she said could mean through Hillel, a Jewish fraternity or another affiliation.

It's a number CFJS is intent on increasing.

"Our No. 1 goal is to light a flame under these students and to re-energize them, to see that their passion stays strong," Berger said.

CFJS leaders said that goal was achieved in Montreal.

Diamond said students, in addition to socializing, having fun and participating in scores of workshops, "questioned themselves on why Judaism was important to them and what they wanted to see their communities doing" to encourage Jewish students to "do Jewish" in any way, from practising tikkun olam to asserting Jewish identity.

The frames of reference for NOW did not include passing resolutions or establishing policy. Nor did it focus on a specific, topical issue, as it did last year with Darfur.

What the weekend did include were meetings of the executive board, sessions and workshops on CFJS and scores of topical and relevant issues on Israel, Judaism, globalization and anti-Semitism in France, as well as presentations on "Jewish Women and Body Image" and "Kosher Sex: the Jewish Kama Sutra."

Among the highlights, Berger said, was an inspirational session led by David Bornstein, author of How to Change the World, and Tzvi Sperber, director of United Israel Appeals Federation Canada's Canada-Israel Experience.

Other participants included Hershell Ezrin, founding CEO of the Canadian Council of Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA); Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber; former Canadian ambassador to Israel David Berger; National Post writer Stewart Bell, who specializes in terrorism and security issues; and FEDERATION CJA president Richard Vineberg.

Ethiopian-Israeli comedian performs at IsraelFEST

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto kicked off IsraelFEST last week, an annual week-long festival showcasing Israeli innovation, tourism and culture, with a performance by Yossi Vassa, an Ethiopian-Israeli actor and comedian.

The one-man show called It Sounds Better in Amharic, co-written and directed by Israeli-born Shai Ben Attar, chronicles Vassa's 700-kilometre journey on foot from a small Ethiopian village to a Sudanese refugee camp and finally to Israel.

This comedic and insightful performance offers an outside perspective of Israeli culture through the eyes of an immigrant coming from a very different world, while shedding light on the culture he left behind.

While Vassa, who has been called the Eddie Murphy of Israel, managed to find humour in the situation of a 10-year-old boy trying desperately to fit into a culture so different from his, he also informed the audience at the Miles Nadal JCC of the difficulty of the year-long journey to Israel, which he barely survived.

He described having to walk for hours at night, hiding from robbers and soldiers and running low on food and water on his three-month trek before arriving at the Sudanese refugee camp.

He recalled having to dig graves with his bare hands to bury his two younger brothers and his grandmother who succumbed to disease and malnourishment in the camp before his family and thousands of others were airlifted to Israel as part of Operation Moses in 1985.

But before the crowd could dwell on the tragedy that befell Vassa and his family, he had the 100-person audience laughing about his first thoughts when he arrived in Netanya.

"Netanya is a scary place," he said.

"Have you ever seen The Sopranos? Well, Netanya is like New Jersey."

Coming from a small village, without television, Vassa, who is now a graduate of Haifa University, was also shocked to discover people with a different skin colour.

"When I first got to Israel, I saw so many white people, it freaked me out.

"I remember thinking, 'I have to be sensitive to these whities. They're a rare breed. They could get sunburned!'"

The 50-minute show, which he also performs in Hebrew and Amharic, combined storytelling, standup comedy, music, and even a little singing.

It gave the audience an opportunity to learn about the difficulties of integrating into Israeli culture – and to laugh about it.

Vassa and Ben Attar have been touring the show in Israel, North America and Europe since December 2002.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Food to munch while you watch the Super Bowl

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The best rule to follow when feeding anyone watching a sporting event is to keep it simple. Over the years, I have developed a repertoire of dips, wraps, spreads and snacks that everyone loves to eat before, during and after dinner. I try and mix it up a little and have a few hot and cold munchies to serve next to the chips, salsa, veggies and soft drinks.

Super Bowl Sunday is as much about food as it is about who is victorious. But everybody wins when you serve these tried and true recipes.

HOT SPINACH CHEESE DIP

1 pkg. frozen chopped spinach, thawed and squeezed dry
1 pkg. cream cheese, softened
1 cup freshly grated cheddar cheese
1 cup freshly grated Monterey Jack cheese
8 oz. sour cream
1 tbsp. grated, peeled onions
1 tsp. spicy brown mustard
2 cloves garlic, crushed
¼ tsp. sea salt
¼ tsp. fresh ground black pepper
3 dashes hot sauce, optional

Combine all ingredients in a large, microwave-safe bowl. Microwave on high for 2 minutes. Stir; microwave another 2 minutes. Stir again and microwave for 1 minute. Serve piping hot. Makes 4 cups.

BAKED PIZZA DIP

1 tub whipped cream cheese spread
1 tsp. Italian seasoning
1 pkg. (8 oz.) shredded Mozzarella cheese, divided
1 cup pizza sauce

Preheat oven to 350. In the bowl of an electric mixer combine the cream cheese and Italian seasoning to blend. Spread the seasoned cream cheese on the bottom of 9-in. pie plate. Top with 1 cup of the Mozzarella cheese then spread the pizza sauce on top of the cheese and top with the remaining Mozzarella cheese. Bake for 15 to 20 minutes or until dip is heated through and cheese is melted. Great with crackers or pieces of French bread. Makes approximately 20 servings.

BAKED RUBEN DIP

1 cup grated Swiss cheese
1 cup drained sauerkraut
⅓ cup sour cream
2 tsp. spicy brown mustard
1 tbsp. ketchup
2 tsp. minced onion
1 pkg. cream cheese, cubed
½ cup imitation bacon bits
½ to 1 tsp. caraway seeds

Preheat oven to 350. Combine all ingredients in ovenproof glass bowl. Mix to combine. Cover and bake 30 minutes then uncover the dip and bake for an additional 5 to 10 minutes until the top is golden. Serves 6 to 8. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

BAKED ONION RINGS

¼ cup flour
¼ tsp. garlic powder
¼ tsp. dry mustard
¼ tsp. table salt
2 large Spanish onions, sliced into ¼-in.-thick rounds
½ cup buttermilk or non-dairy substitute
1 cup seasoned bread crumbs
olive oil-flavoured cooking spray

Preheat oven to 400. (The oven must be hot for best results.) Coat a large baking sheet with olive oil cooking spray and set it aside. In a large bowl, combine the flour, garlic powder, mustard powder and salt. Add onions and toss to coat.

Pour buttermilk into a large bowl, add onions and toss to coat. Place the bread crumbs in a separate large bowl, add onions and toss to coat. Transfer onions to prepared baking sheet and spray the top of the coated onions lightly with the olive oil cooking spray. Bake until golden brown, 35 minutes. Serve hot. Serves 6 to 8 appetizer servings. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

CORRECTION

In the article "Recipe Ideas from Out of the Cold" (CJN, Jan. 26), the recipe for Ridiculously Easy Banana Muffins (or Loaf or Cake) should have called for 1¼ cups of flour. The CJN regrets the error.

Hamas acting 'responsibly' thus far: Mofaz

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said in Sunday's cabinet meeting that Hamas was, at this point, acting "responsibly," and added that he believed that the organization would soon attempt to rein in terror. He added that the Palestinians were in shock following Hamas victory in last week's Palestinian Authority legislative elections.

Acting prime minister Ehud Olmert took a firm line in the meeting, saying that Israel would not have any contact with Hamas until and unless the organization renounces terrorism and recognizes Israel's right to exist, as well as all agreements hitherto signed with Israel.

Olmert reported on his and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni's weekend efforts to convince world leaders to take a firm stance against Hamas' terror activity. Olmert declared that the international community stood behind Israel.

"We clarified that without a clear abandonment of the path of terror, a recognition of Israel's right to exist in security and peace … Israel won't have any contact with the Palestinians," Olmert said. "These principles are accepted by the international community. On this issue, I don't intend to make any compromises."

National Infrastructure Minister Ze'ev Boim (Kadima) said that a distinction must be made between transferring money to the PA as long as Hamas has not taken its place in the government and transferring funds after Hamas takes over, in which case, Boim said, there would be "new rules."

Under the 1995 Israel-PA interim agreements, agreements Hamas does not recognize, Israel is to transfer to the PA each month tax and customs revenues it collects on the PA's behalf. A payment of some $60 million (US) is scheduled to take place tomorrow.

Yuval Diskin, head of Shin Bet (Israel Security Services) said on Sunday in a government meeting that Hamas are unsure of their next move following their election victory, saying that it may be prepared to accept a unity government with Fatah if it would ensure that funding to the Palestinian people continues.

He warned, however, that Iran was considering giving financial aid to the Palestinians if Europe and the United States cease funding the PA in light of Hamas' victory.

He added that Fatah would be making a grave mistake if it lets PA President Mahmoud Abbas resign from his post.

One government official said that Israel was in no rush to publicize any decision on how it will deal with Hamas, beyond the carefully crafted statement that followed last Thursday night's meeting of the security cabinet. That statement made clear that Israel would have no dealings with a government in which Hamas was a participant.

Government officials said that Israel wanted to see what happened over the course of the next few days before making operative decisions.

"What happens if we say we won't transfer the money, and the next day Hamas disarms and repeals its charter," one official in the Prime Minister's Office asked.

The official said that although the payment is due Friday, Israel could always "hold it up" for a few days, as has been done in the past.

Over the weekend, Olmert spoke with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Jordan's King Abdullah, French President Jacques Chirac and UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

One official said that Mubarak and Abdullah, who both have strong radical Islamic elements in their own countries, were also worried about the Hamas landslide, and the possibility that it may spill over into their regimes.

Mubarak said that he would be speaking to the Palestinian leadership this week about the election results, and Abdullah called on the Palestinians to demonstrate "responsibility." Livni was scheduled to travel to Egypt Wednesday to talk with Mubarak about the new situation.

Olmert told both Arab leaders that Israel was deeply concerned about the election results, and would not co-operate with Hamas or with a PA government in which Hamas was a member.

He also said that Israel's position was clear, and needed to be made clear to the Palestinians: Hamas must be dismantled and it must repeal its charter calling for Israel's destruction.

RENOWNED KABBALIST DIES: More than 200,000 people turned out Sunday for the funeral of the venerated kabbalist Rabbi Yitzhak Kadouri, inset, who died the previous night in Jerusalem of complications from pneumonia. The rabbi's age was reported to be between 104 and 112. Rabbi Kadouri, who was buried in Jerusalem's Har Hamenuhot cemetery, led a quiet life, immersed in Torah and good deeds. Traffic was brought to a halt for several hours as one of the largest funeral processions ever seen in the capital made its way from the Bukharan area of the city, where Rabbi Kadouri lived in a modest home, to the rabbi's final resting place in Givat Shaul. Security forces brace for violent evacuation in Hebron

By YAAKOV KATZ and YIGAL GRAYEFF
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Obtaining a green light from the High Court of Justice, the Israel Defence Forces and Israel Police on Sunday began training and gearing up for violent confrontations expected this week during the evacuations of the illegal outpost of Amona and the Hebron marketplace.

Security officials said that already close to 100 far-right activists had infiltrated Hebron to assist settlers there in preventing the evacuation of the Mizpe Shalhevet outpost in the Hebron marketplace. Some 6,000 soldiers and police officers were scheduled to participate in the evacuation and the army planned to declare the area a closed military zone to prevent additional activists from reaching the city. The demolition and evacuation of nine permanent homes in Amona was scheduled to begin the day following the evacuation from Hebron.

On Sunday, Hebron Brigade commander Colonel Motti Baruch met with the Hebron settlers to convince them to evacuate willingly and without force. Security officials said they did not believe the talks would bear fruit and predicted settlers would violently resist the evacuation and might even open fire on evacuating forces. Channel 10 reported Sunday night that the settlers had reached an agreement with the army and that on Monday they planned to leave their homes willingly, but Hebron spokesperson David Wilder rejected the report.

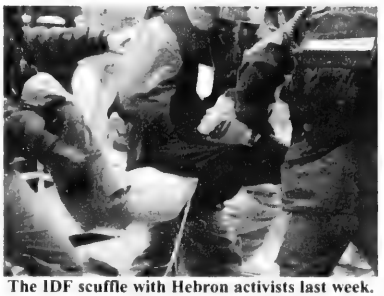
"We expect extreme violence during the evacuation," a senior officer told the Jerusalem Post. "We cannot rule out any scenario, including the possibility that there will be gunfire."

The officer said security forces planned to arrest anyone who raised a hand against a soldier or a police officer. "We will not tolerate any violence," he said. "If they throw rocks or paint bottles at us, we will not let them get away."

In an effort to quell settler resistance, Maj.-Gen. Yair Naveh issued 21 restriction orders against far-right activists from across the West Bank on Sunday, banning them from entering Amona or Hebron for the next month. Police succeeded in delivering only nine of the orders after they encountered fierce resistance during the distribution in the settlement of Yitzhar – a known right-wing stronghold. Four people were arrested after settlers there threw stones at police vehicles and spread spikes on the road.

Security officials said the 21 people issued the orders were known far-right activists who the Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) had gathered intelligence on, indicating they could violently resist the evacuations or launch reprisal attacks against Palestinians.

Meanwhile Sunday, close to 2,000 police officers began training for the evacuation, which will be spearheaded by the Border Police and commanders who participated in the evacuation from the Gaza Strip this past summer.



The IDF scuffle with Hebron activists last week. [Israel photo]

Evacuating forces will be split into three rings – with 1,600 in the inner circle charged with the physical evacuation, a second circle made up of close to 1,000 Border Police officers to deal with public disturbances, and a third circle made up of four infantry regiments – totalling close to 3,000 soldiers who will secure the entire city and prevent clashes with local Palestinians. The evacuation will be commanded by Asst.-Cmdr. Meir Bokovza – deputy head of the Judea and Samaria District.

Security forces, officials said, would employ similar methods to those used during the disengagement from the Gaza Strip this past summer. Evacuating forces will enter Hebron and Amona unarmed but will wear helmets and additional protective body gear. Those carrying out the operation will also be different than the police officers and soldiers who participated in the withdrawal from Gaza, police said.

Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum mourn the untimely passing of our dear friend and supporter

ANDREA BRONFMAN ז"ל

Her exceptional vision and her commitment to art and culture in Israel were inspirational.

We extend heartfelt condolences to her husband Charles, their children and the entire family.

Chairs, Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum

'We shall miss Andy terribly'

Bronfman's daughter, Pippa Cohen, speaking on behalf of her siblings and their children, spoke of the park as a metaphor for her mother.

"Gan Shoshanim embodied Andy and her love of the outdoors. The park is a welcoming place for the community, just like Andy's heart was always kind, warm and welcoming."

The London-born Bronfman was also active in many charities outside of Israel. One of the most recent was the Gift of New York, which benefited families of the victims of 9/11.

In slow and sombre tones addressed directly to Bronfman's grieving husband Charles, former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres said that "none of us can accept the cruel, unjustified intervention cutting short the life of so special an individual.

"In the homes of Jerusalem and in the prayers of our hearts, we shall miss Andy terribly and painfully."

In a reference to the many philanthropic projects and programs that Bronfman was involved in, and choking back tears, Janet Aviad, director of the Karev Foundation, pointed out that "Andy's zeal for young people was unmatched."

Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was the last to eulogize Bronfman. He spoke about her uncompromising commitment to Jerusalem and the sad irony of this, her last and final trip to Israel's capital.

"Andy returns to where she really belongs. She lived in many places, but there is only one place where she belonged Jerusalem.

"When times were very difficult for the city and the people of Jerusalem, Andy and Charles were here.

"She was a person of truth, and at the end of the day, that is why so many people cared for and will miss her."

The family intoned the words of the Kaddish as the rain that had been falling hard on the canvas cover of the tent began to abate.

After the Kaddish, Bronfman's body was interred on the Mount of Olives, where, according to Jewish tradition, many of our people's righteous are buried.

Bronfman is survived by her husband, Charles, son Jeremy Cohen and wife Marci Ann, daugher Pipppa Cohen, son Tony Cohen and wife Moira, stepson Stephen Bronfman and wife Claudine, stepdaughter Ellen Hauptman and husband Andrew, sister Marcia (Kappy) Flanders, and six grandchildren.

Omri Sharon apologizes

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's son apologized for illicitly funding his father's 1999 run to head the Likud Party. "I made mistakes, serious mistakes, and I'm sorry for it," Omri Sharon told a Tel Aviv court last week in closing arguments before he is sentenced as part of a plea bargain. He pleaded guilty last year to fraud and bribery in connection with the Likud primary in 1999, saying he illegally solicited foreign funding without his father's knowledge. He told the court that 1999 was the year his mother, the late Lily Sharon, was diagnosed with cancer, and said this affected his judgment. The prime minister has been cleared in the case, and his hospitalization after a stroke has led to speculation his son could be spared jail time. Sentencing is expected later this month.

Lapid quits Shinui

Yosef "Tommy" Lapid resigned last week from his Shinui Party. Lapid, a Holocaust survivor whose party rode a wave of anti-religious sentiment to become the Knesset's third-largest faction in the 2003 election, blamed low voter support on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's new centrist Kadima Party, which is attracting many Shinui backers. Polls suggest Shinui may not win enough votes in the March 28 election to take a single Knesset seat.

Film on bombers shunned

An award-winning film about Palestinian suicide bombers will not be shown at major Israeli cinemas. Paradise Now, named best foreign language film at last month's Golden Globes, has been shunned by Israel's eight cinema chains. Distribution experts blame the film's sympathetic depiction of two men who volunteer for a suicide bombing mission, which has drawn criticism from terror victims. The film is in limited release in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

Anti-Semitism down: JAFI

The Jewish Agency for Israel reported a dip in anti-Semitic incidents worldwide last year, crediting political pressure and police crackdowns. Agency chairman Zeev Bielski and Israel's Diaspora minister, Avraham Hirschson presented the 2005 data at a news conference held by the Global Forum Against Anti-Semitism. There were fewer anti-Semitic incidents in Britain, France, Belgium and the Czech Republic – considered hot spots of anti-Jewish hostility – compared to 2004, thanks to police action against culprits. However, Russia and Ukraine saw a considerable increase in anti-Semitic incidents.

Israel marks Holocaust Day

Interim Prime Minister Ehud Olmert voiced hope that International Holocaust Day would help fight anti-Semitism worldwide. He chaired a special cabinet session at Yad Vashem last week ahead of the UN-declared global memorial day. "I hope that this step will lead to the awareness of the Holocaust being instilled in many publics around the world, which for years tried to evade the need to deal with the Holocaust in all its aspects. I also hope that this step will lead to a reduction in anti-Semitism and Holocaust-denial," Olmert told fellow ministers. The annual event, approved last year, was marked for the first time last Friday.

Bush backs Israel vs. Iran

U.S. George W. President Bush pledged to protect Israel in case of Iranian attack. "I'm concerned" when the president of Iran "announces his desire to see that Israel gets destroyed," Bush said in a speech on terrorism at Kansas State University last week. "We're committed to the safety of Israel, and it's a commitment we will keep." It was the latest reassurance from U.S. officials after a recent war of words between Israel and Iran over the prospects of an Iranian nuclear bomb.

Assassin's brother convicted

The brother of former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassin was convicted of threatening Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's life. Hagai Amir, who is serving a 16-year jail sentence for helping his brother, Yigal, shoot Rabin in 1995, was convicted last week of threatening Sharon's life. Prosecutors say Amir told prison guards he could arrange for Sharon to be killed "with one phone call." His lawyers said the comments were a "joke."

Rescue team sent to Kenya

Israel sent a search-and-rescue team last week to the site of a Kenyan building collapse. Eighty disaster and medical relief personnel were sent to Nairobi, where scores of people were believed to be trapped in the rubble of a collapsed multi-storey building. Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni ordered the mission after receiving appeals from Kenya to help in the Jan. 23 disaster.

More kids are poor: report

More than one in three Israeli children are poor, new statistics show. Some 1.58 million Israelis lived below the poverty line as of June 2005, according to statistics compiled by the National Insurance Institute. The number of children living in poverty, 738,000, has jumped from 482,000 in 2000.

AIPAC case sentence chills free-speech community

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — It was surprising enough that the judge quadrupled the prosecution's recommended sentence for Lawrence Franklin, from three years to more than 12.

But the true bombshell at the Jan. 13 sentencing of the former Pentagon analyst, who is at the centre of the case involving pro-Israel lobbyists and classified information, came as lawyers were shutting their briefcases.

That's when U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III told the court in Alexandria, Va., that he believed civilians are just as liable as government employees under laws governing the dissemination of classified information.

"Persons who have unauthorized possession, who come into unauthorized possession of classified information, must abide by the law," Ellis said. "That applies to academics, lawyers, journalists, professors, whatever."

It was difficult to say whether Ellis was thinking out loud or pronouncing his judicial philosophy. But if those are Ellis' jury instructions in April, when two former staffers of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) go on trial, the implications could have major consequences – not just for Steve Rosen and Keith Weissman, but for how Americans consider national security questions.

Defence lawyers for Rosen and Weissman have joined a free speech watchdog in casting the case as a major First Amendment battle.

"The implications of this prosecution to news gatherers and others who work in First Amendment cases cannot be overstated," lawyers for the former AIPAC staffers wrote in last month in support of an application from the Reporters Committee for the Freedom of the Press to file an amicus brief.

The case is believed to be the first ever to apply a World War I-era statute that criminalizes the dissemination of classified information by U.S. civilians.

Franklin pleaded guilty to a similar statute barring government employees from leaking classified information. That statute has rarely been prosecuted – the last successful prosecution experts can recall was in the 1980s.

JTA has learned that the defence team for Rosen and Weissman last month filed a brief by Viet Dinh, the former assistant attorney general who was the principal drafter of the USA Patriot Act, arguing that federal prosecutors in the case were interpreting classified information protections too broadly.

Franklin, a mid-level Iran analyst at the Pentagon, admitted to leaking information to Rosen and Weissman in 2003 because he wanted his concerns about the Iranian threat to reach the White House.

His Pentagon colleagues were focused on Iraq, and Franklin believed AIPAC could get his theories a hearing at the White House's National Security Council. He also leaked information to Naor Gilon, the former chief political officer at the Israeli Embassy.

By the summer of 2004, government agents co-opted Franklin into setting up Rosen and Weissman. He allegedly leaked classified information to Weissman about purported Iranian plans to kill Israeli and American agents in northern Iraq.

Weissman and Rosen allegedly relayed that information to AIPAC colleagues, the media and Gilon. AIPAC fired the two men in March 2005.

In sentencing Franklin, Ellis described the former Pentagon analyst's motives as "laudable," but said his motives were beside the point.

"It doesn't matter that you think you were really helping," Ellis said. "That arrogates to yourself the decision whether to adhere to a statute passed by Congress, and we can't have that in this country."

Those views could be bad news for Rosen and Weissman, who hoped to rest part of their defence on an altruistic desire to save lives.

It also suggests Ellis believes government statutes are sacrosanct, however little they've been used. That's what concerns free-speech advocates.

"These provisions of the Espionage Act are widely recognized in the legal literature as incoherent," said Steven Aftergood, head of the government secrecy project for the Federation of American Scientists, a nuclear watchdog that relies on leaks for its information.

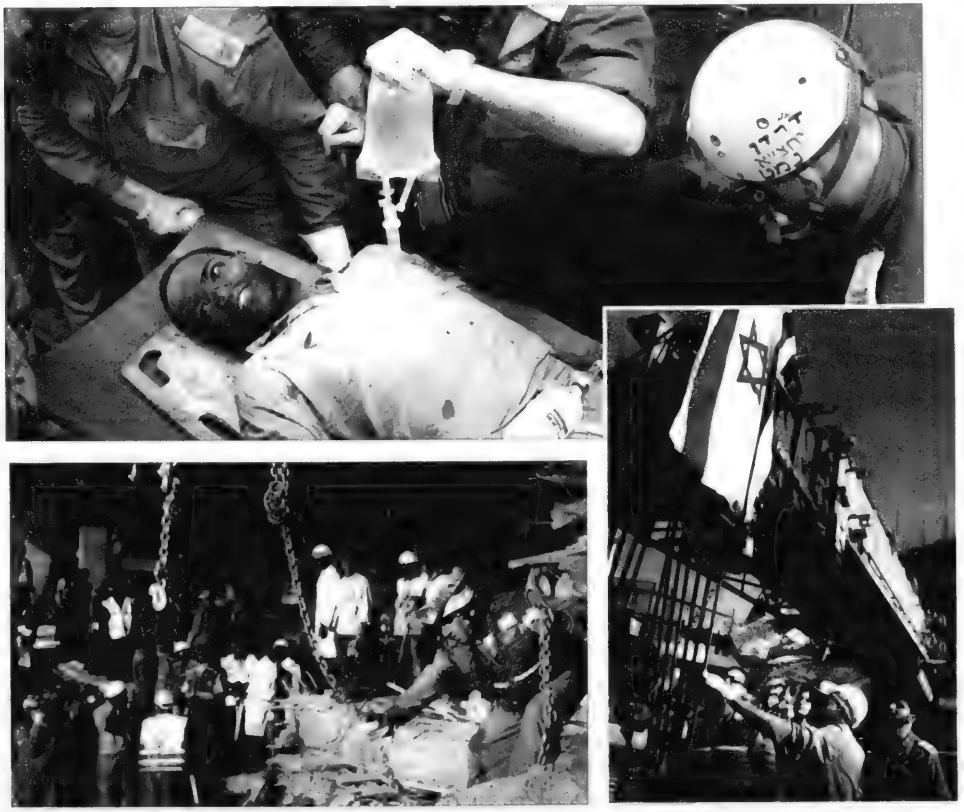
"We do not arrest and charge every reporter who comes into possession of classified information. We do not arrest people who receive leaks of classified information. We never have," he said. "For the judge to suggest otherwise is quite shocking."

Lucy Dalglish, the Reporters Committee executive director, described the case as "terribly important."

"If we had a situation where journalists can be punished for receiving information, hello police state," she said.

Franklin's sentence seemed exceptionally tough, given the prosecution's tentative agreement to recommend a three-year sentence if Franklin co-operated against Rosen and Weissman.

But Ellis' sentence – abiding by strict government sentencing guidelines – was mainly a technicality, since Franklin is not going to go to jail until his co-operation with the prosecution is complete.



ISRAEL HELPS KENYA: Israeli IDF Home Command personnel flew to Kenya last week to assist in the rescue operation following the collapse of a building in Nairobi on Jan. 23. The team was able to locate and save two people caught in the rubble; it also located three bodies. The Israeli team, which included specially trained dogs, returned home when all possible survivors and bodies of the victims had been removed. The government of Kenya officially requested Israel to help it train Kenyans to conduct such rescue operations in the future. [Isranet photos]

Rabbis prioritize fitness, despite hectic schedules

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Erwin Schild

Rabbi ReuvenTradburks

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich

Rabbi Moshe Stern

A strong proponent and fine example of the benefits of physical fitness, Rabbi Erwin Schild was somewhat of a pioneer when he took up running three times a week in the late 1950s.

And for a congregational rabbi, it's never been easy to carve out time for extracurricular activities.

"Today, often, I'm amazed I made the time to do it," the rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation told The CJN recently. Speaking from St. Petersburg, Fla., he had just returned from his daily (Shabbat excepted) hour-long power walk.

"I'm doing more speedwalking now than running," he said, explaining that he modified his routine following his 85th birthday last March.

As a youngster in Germany, the future rabbi was "anything but athletic," he recalled.

In Toronto, when he was in his late 20s, Rabbi Schild began taking fitness classes at the Jewish Y on Brunswick Avenue, an activity he continued at the YM&YWHA (now the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre) following his synagogue's move to North York. He was initially motivated by a household move, during which he became winded carrying boxes up a flight of stairs.

One of the rabbi's fitness instructors was a firm believer in running. Rabbi Schild himself found it "very good for my fitness, and it kept my weight down."

But he quickly realized that the benefits were not only physical. Running provided "a heightened awareness," an opportunity to practice self-discipline, and to spend time thinking.

Unlike Rabbi Schild, Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich of Beth Sholom Congregation has made exercise part of his life from a young age.

Now 39, he has put his thrice-weekly hockey games on ice due to a knee injury, but he continues cardio and weight training at a gym three to four times a week.

The sole rabbi of an 1,100-family congregation, Rabbi Flanzraich said it would not be good for anybody – family, community or congregation – if the demands of a rabbi's job were to take a toll on his health.

"You have to make sure you're able to give," he said, noting in addition the halachic directive to take care of one's health.

He admits, however, that sometimes he has to force himself to go to the gym.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, the 48-year-old spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah, also works out regularly, but he didn't find the motivation until his doctor recommended that he start.

Like many people, he knew he "should be doing something, but was waiting for the catalyst."

Now the rabbi, who has a family history of heart disease, views exercise as "something I have to do in order to stay healthy."

In the winter, he works out on an elliptical machine while listening to Yeshiva University lectures or online classes. Recently, he added weight training to his routine, and in the summer, he swims.

Like Rabbi Schild, he tries to fit in a workout every day, with the exception of Shabbat. Even a half hour investment of time pays off in energy gained throughout the day, he finds. It also clears his mind, and he finds his head is filled with ideas during the session.

"If I don't work out, I find I have trouble focusing, and I need more breaks."

Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, like rabbis Schild and Tradburks, also works out on a daily basis, Jewish holidays excepted.

A onetime avid runner, he switched to the stationary bicycle after his knee started acting up.

"I've always been somewhat athletic, and I've always enjoyed sports," said the 62-year-old rabbi, who belongs to the BJCC.

As he got older, his dedication to fitness was reinforced as he noticed how other people often deteriorated physically by not taking care of themselves.

When he travels, he takes along his workout clothes. "I've visited dozens of Jewish community centres," he said.

Like other congregational rabbis, Rabbi Stern juggles responsibilities that include preparation of classes, hospital and shivah visits, communal functions and meetings, officiating at life cycle events, and preparing a weekly sermon.

"It's a seven-day-a-week job, often morning to night."

While he would encourage everyone to exercise and maintain a healthy lifestyle, he would particularly like to see more of his colleagues involved in fitness. "Some do [work out], but many don't."

NOW, MORE THAN EVER!

Passion for Israel leads to joint art exhibit

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Susan Steinberg, left, holding a photograph she took in Israel, and Rina Gottesman, whose painting behind her was inspired by Israel, share a similar creative approach to their work. [Frances Kraft photo]

When Rina Gottesman and Susan Steinberg met on a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto mission to Israel two years ago, the artist and photographer joked that one day they'd have a show together.

The two women don't have to joke about it any more: their work is currently on display at Mashu Mashu, a Middle Eastern restaurant on Spadina Road. Mashu Mashu means "Something Something" in Hebrew.

One of Gottesman's five pieces in the exhibit, which will probably run until early spring, was directly inspired by Israel, and four of Steinberg's 12 photographs were taken there.

"I find the ingenuity and the creativity of the Israeli people very inspiring," said Steinberg recently. "There's such a spark of life there."

They both share a passion for Israel. Steinberg spent seven weeks in Israel as a university student in the early 1960s. Gottesman was born there 50 years ago and her father Sam Rotenberg fought in the War of Independence.

Their close friendship is based in part on their similar approach to creativity and their mutual support for each other's work, which they both undertook seriously and began to study formally only in recent years.

There was "an instant connection" when they met, recalled Gottesman.

Steinberg laughs when she remembers the pre-mission meeting at which she asked Gottesman's husband, Irv, a physician who co-chairs the federation's medical missions, if there were plans for the spouses.

"You'll go with my wife," he said. "You'll love my wife."

The women's show at Mashu Mashu came about after someone mentioned Steinberg's work to the restaurant's owner, who expressed interest in displaying it. "If you like what I do," she told him, "I have a friend who's an artist."

"It was so unplanned," said Gottesman, who works in acrylics and mixed media. Her art resumé only dates back to 1999, but it includes half a dozen awards and participation in almost four dozen shows.

Her work is also currently on display at World of Picture Frames on Cartwright Ave.

"I always loved art," said Gottesman, a child of Holocaust survivors who has lived in Toronto since she was two years old. Her mother, Shoshana Rotenberg, a former Hebrew teacher, used to paint in oils, and her grandfather also had an artistic bent. As a gift for her grandmother before they were married, he drew a picture of two hands held together. Gottesman's sister Charlene Mandelbaum also paints.

A former insurance underwriter, Gottesman left the business world to be at home full-time with her two children, who are now in their 20s.

Steinberg, a mother of three grown sons who cut back significantly on her work as a career consultant and workshop trainer to concentrate on photography, says she "always had a creative side.

"My whole role was to help people find what they are passionate about," she said. "I found a new passion… I wanted to find a way to explore the world through the camera."

Her interests range from human faces to patterns and textures found in nature. She rarely knows what she will shoot with her Canon Elan 7 single lens reflex camera until she sees it.

Recently, she began to sell her work privately and has also exhibited it at a cottage show. The photographs in the exhibit sell for $395, and Gottesman's pieces range from $600 to $950.

One of Steinberg's shots at Mashu Mashu – a Monet-like, glimmering lake surface taken in northern Ontario – prompted someone to ask her if it was a painting, she said.

The Israeli pictures include a luminous-eyed Ethiopian girl at a school for new olim, and a serendipitous zoom-lens shot of a young chassidic boy and his Winnie-the-Pooh bear.

Gottesman has only one painting at the restaurant that is directly Israel-inspired – a mixed-media abstract called Ancient Walls. The copper, indigo and ochre colours and block-like shapes, along with a delicately stamped text, are reminiscent of Jerusalem. The picture evokes "a feeling of antiquity," she said.

"I loved that I was walking on stones that held thousands of years of history and stories."

Steinberg is particularly drawn to a painting of Gottesman's called Becoming. "My background is in [the field of] transition," she explains. The semi-abstract piece, which can be seen on Gottesman's website (www.rinagottesman.com/show.html) consists of five female figures partly inspired by the Ethiopian Jews she encountered in Israel.

Like Steinberg, Gottesman has no plan when she sets out to create an image. She loves faces, and black lines that evoke a mood or an image. Often, her work features themes of women and friendship.

"We paint and photograph what speaks to us, and what comes from our hearts," said Gottesman.

Seymour Mayne renews himself with latest poetry anthology

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

One needs a "strong sense of perseverance" to be a poet, says Seymour Mayne, the Ottawa professor and wordsmith whose recent slim volume September Rain (Mosaic Press) is the 29th book of poetry he's published since 1964 – "keneinehora, almost 41 years ago."

Educated at the Talmud Torah in his native Montreal, Mayne visited the Jewish Public Library often in the 1950s and absorbed much modern Jewish writing. In the 1960s, he studied Canadian literature at McGill University, learning from and crossing paths with the likes of Louis Dudek, Irving Layton, Leonard Cohen and many other luminaries.

Today, his own star has risen considerably in the sphere of Canadian literature. Much anthologized and translated, he has developed followings in Spain and Israel, as well as in Canada. Several of his humorous short stories have been published in Spanish translation in Spain, where he's been described as "a Canadian Woody Allen," and four of his poetry volumes have appeared in Israel in Hebrew translation.

"I've been writing and publishing since I was a teenager," he said recently over a cup of coffee at the Nadal Jewish Community Centre in Toronto. "If you ask me why I do it, I say I have a need to shape words into utterances that on the one hand give people a degree of pleasure, and on the other hand communicate something to them about the significance of everyday life.

"Sounds old-fashioned and it is," he continued. "You want to give people pleasure at the same time as some kind of insightful illumination into experience. And if you can do both, then it's a wonderful miracle that suddenly appears on the page."

Mayne has produced that particular miracle on the page enough times that Arnold Ages, the distinguished southern Ontario professor and literary critic, proposed in an essay last fall that Mayne should be considered for the Nobel Prize in literature, potentially joining the ranks of Jewish winners such as S.Y. Agnon, Elias Canetti, Imre Kertesz and Nelly Sachs.

> 'Poet is as prolific as ever'

Among other qualities, Ages cited Mayne's "attachment to, and love of, pure poetry, Jewish tradition, the Hebrew Bible and Canadian Jewry," adding that "Mayne has transformed that which is dear to his heart into a universal poetic language."

Last year, an Italian university student wrote a thesis dissertation on him, "so I've been pre-embalmed while living," joked Mayne, a University of Ottawa English professor.

The poems in September Rain are divided into four sections, each with its own theme. The first poem, Ottawa Dozes Amidst Its Leafy Trees, signals a "seasons" theme as well as Mayne's deep Canadian sensibility. The other sections deal respectively with Spain, Israel and his deceased parents.

The writing is light and airy, rarely seeming to fill the page, but often soaring through a poetic loftiness. Jewish and biblical stories and images pop up recurrently throughout, as does the universal imagery of death.

"I close the book with a poem that draws on the passing of the seasons, with the underlying theme of renewal," he said. "And by that I mean personal renewal, seasonal renewal [and] cultural renewal. Regarding the overall theme of the collection, the key word is 'renewal.'"

Indeed, the collection is bursting with images of death and new life, as in the poem Hail, which opens with the memorable line: "Hail peppered the air like seed/ as you were lowered/ below the frost line."

Having branched into short fiction in recent years, Mayne contributed a story to the latest issue of Parchment, but he disclaims any aspiration to write a novel.

"One must have a gene to be a novelist," he said. "I think my DNA included the gene for poetry, the gene for short fiction and the gene for the essay, in that descending order. I don't have the gene for the novel."

Still, he seems as prolific as ever, with several new volumes of various sorts in the works, both at home and abroad. "As a writer, it's the promise of renewal that keeps me writing," he said. "It also keeps me optimistic about the Jewish future. Everything cycles, and hopefully for the better."

John Lennon and the Flaming Red Rabbi

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

"All we are say-y-ying… is give peace a chance." Many of us have sung along with the famous John Lennon tune, a peace anthem recorded on June 1, 1969, in a suite in Montreal's Queen Elizabeth Hotel.

Lennon's death at the hands of a crazed fan recently passed its 25th anniversary, an occasion marked by a fresh crop of books about the singer. But only recently has it become widely known that a Toronto rabbi inspired John to write Give Peace a Chance, the song's title and arguably its only memorable line.

When a hastily assembled group joined Lennon and Yoko Ono, during their "Bed-In for Peace," to record the song, Abraham Feinberg, then the former senior rabbi of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, was there. Lennon and Rabbi Feinberg had met and bonded a few days before.

A recent estate offering of Lennon memorabilia in London confirms this: the word "rabbi," Rabbi Feinberg's phone number and a rough draft of the song appear in John's handwriting on both sides of a hotel letterhead envelope. The Sunday Times reported that John at first planned to record the song only with Feinberg, a former singer, under the name "John Lennon and the Flaming Red Rabbi."

Although Suite 1742 has long since been refurbished, people frequently ask to see or stay in the "John Lennon suite," which is decorated with photos and memorabilia, and is frequently used for fundraising purposes, says Joanne Papineau, director of public relations at the Fairmont Queen Elizabeth. She concedes that some of Lennon's lines in Give Peace a Chance were rather nonsensical, like the rhyming neologisms "bagism, shagism, dragism," or seemingly random names like "Bobby Dylan" and "Norman Mailer" (neither man was there in person, but Lennon admired them).

A single red rose in mysterious tribute rests on the hall table outside of Suite 1742. (Every year on Dec. 8, the day Lennon was murdered, two dozen roses, half red and half white, are left anonymous at the door of the suite.) Inside the suite, after we gazed around at the photos and gold records on the walls, we agree that Give Peace a Chance endures because of its unforgettable chorus, which has now been credited to Rabbi Feinberg.

John Lennon with Yoko Ono at their Bed-In for Peace in Montreal.

"John," the rabbi reputedly said during a conversation, "we really have to give peace a chance." Lennon's political stance against the war in Vietnam was a view shared by Rabbi Feinberg, who had visited North Vietnam leader Ho Chi Minh as part of an interfaith delegation in 1967; his book, Rabbi Feinberg's Hanoi Diary, was published in 1968.

Lennon and Rabbi Feinberg connected just as the anti-war movement was getting a boost of energy from rock's most-famous couple. Fresh from their Gibraltar wedding and an Amsterdam Bed-In, Lennon and Ono received 150 journalists a day from May 26 to June 2 in Montreal, while they were stretched out in bed wearing their pajamas.

They ordered room-service meals as well as special items that included "an extra-large comb" and a "cage for a white mouse." At the height of the circus-like scene in Suite 1742 – a frequent source of complaint from other hotel guests – Lennon and 50-odd friends recorded what would become an anthem for a generation. From unknowns to celebrities like LSD guru Timothy Leary, comedian Tommy Smothers, singer Petula Clark, and Apple Corps press agent Derek Taylor, everybody sang the words John had taped on the walls. Papineau reports there was much enthusiastic kicking of the door's brass plates to provide extra rhythm.

Lennon, naturally, sang the lead. In a 1970 Rolling Stone interview, he said: "In my secret heart, I wanted to write something that would take over from We Shall Overcome. I don't know why that's the only one they sang. I thought: why isn't somebody writing one for the people now? That's what my job is."

Rabbi Feinberg, now revealed as Lennon's not-so-unlikely muse, was born in Ohio in 1899 and became a rabbi in the 1920s. But he left to pursue his own singing career in the mid-1930s. Under the moniker "Arthur Frome," Rabbi Feinberg's successful career lasted three years on New York radio, where he was heralded as the "Poet Prince of the Airwaves." As Sharon Drache writes in The Canadian Encyclopedia: "Alarmed by the rise of Hitler and Nazi Germany, Feinberg became a rabbi again." He was a rabbi at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple from 1943 to '61.

A generation of Canadians knew of and respected Rabbi Feinberg. He earned a reputation as a peace activist and anti-racist, and a man who believed in dialogue. He forged a natural bond with Canada's youth. In addition to writing books, he voiced his liberal views in frequent contributions to Maclean's, the Globe and Mail and the Toronto Star. Admirers affectionately dubbed him the "radical rabbi"; the less enthusiastic called him the "flaming red rabbi," the tag Lennon liked.

One afternoon, in 1971, my boyfriend and I were delegated to fetch Rabbi Feinberg and drive him to our friend Marty's wedding, where he performed the service. During the ride, he told us he had recently recorded the Dylan song "I Shall Be Released." We were very impressed; this was one hip rabbi.

Feinberg returned to the United States soon afterward, where he became rabbi-in-residence at San Francisco's Glide Memorial Church, which provides programs for poor and marginalized people. He died at age 87, in Reno, Nev. He had told the Toronto Star that he regarded Holy Blossom Temple as his "spiritual home" and Toronto as "home," since he'd lived here longer than anywhere else.

For years, Queen Elizabeth Hotel staff have known about the Feinberg-Lennon conversations, confirms Papineau. In November 2005, Taylor's estate offered the Lennon envelope for sale at Bonham's Auction House in London, and the press connected the dots between the singer and the rabbi. However, the envelope never made it to public auction. It was sold to a private buyer for a good price, says a Bonham's spokesperson. Speculation is that it fetched about $400,000 and that the buyer was none other than Ono.

YIDDISH MOVIE FROM MONSEY OFFERS GLIMPSE INTO PRIVATE ORTHODOX REALM

Brothers Yakov and Mendy Kirsh, a bookkeeper and real estate agent respectively, wanted to make a feature film set within their Yiddish-speaking Orthodox community in Monsey, N.Y., without the "dangerous influence of Hollywood" or any other "treif" elements.

The result is A Gesheft (The Deal), a 90-minute action-packed drama about "a religious-school flunky run amok." The movie was shot on location in religious schools and business establishments, and acted mostly by chassidic community members with no prior dramatic experience. The language of the film is the deeply accented, religious Yiddish sometimes called Hyemish. The filmmakers claim it is the first Yiddish film made in 60 years.

The story focuses on Peretz Grossberg, a flamboyant and colourful wheeler-dealer who straddles the Orthodox Jewish world and the wider secular world. His counterpoint is the sage Rabbi Wolf, who is steadfast in his belief despite excessive tribulations. The pair find their lives intertwined in what Rabbi Wolf describes as "bashert" (God's master plan). They are left to teach each other about their place on earth.

This was the first movie-making experience for the actors and the chief filmmakers, who invested much of their savings in it. The one film pro on the project was editor Ruven Millman, who took it on because of his personal interest in the Yiddish language. "I've dreamed of making a modern theatrical film in Yiddish for years," he said.

While television is normally taboo in most chassidic households, the filmmakers report that the Orthodox community has shown great interest in the film. Released by Kosher Entertainment Productions, it is available on DVD at www.mostlymusic.com. View the trailers at www.agesheft.com

Names in the News: George Faludy, the 95-year-old Hungarian-Jewish poet who lived in Toronto from the late 1960s through the late '80s, was the focus of a recent celebration in Budapest at the home of the Canadian ambassador to Hungary. The reception paid homage to Faludy as the city of Toronto prepares to honour him by naming a downtown parkette after him and erecting a bronze medallion bearing his likeness.

Grace Westcott, of the organizing committee, presented Faludy with a framed original watercolour sketch of the planned landscape design for the park, as an actor read several excerpts from Faludy's writings. Press coverage of the event in Hungary was extensive, Westcott said. "Faludy replied to the speech to say how grateful he was to Canada," she reported. "He said that he had never felt so free in his life as he did in Canada."

Situated at Charles and Bay, George Faludy Place is due to open in the spring to coincide with the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian uprising of 1956.

Names in the News II: Jack Wayne, who founded and runs Canadian Scholars Press, has launched Kellom, a new imprint that features the work of male authors. A credible account of Jamaican Jewish history

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

To Canadians seeking a respite from the arctic blasts of winter, the lush Caribbean island of Jamaica offers immediate relief in the form of sand, surf, sun and exquisite vistas.

But Jamaica is also an extremely interesting, though little known, outpost in the Diaspora, a fact that becomes clear in The Island of One People (Ian Randle Publishers) by Marilyn Delevante and Anthony Alberga.

As Delevante and Alberga inform us in this engaging book, Jews have lived in Jamaica since the dawn of European colonization in the 16th century. And although Jews have never accounted for more than about five per cent of the island's population, their contributions, particularly in the realm of business, have been keenly felt.

In this amply illustrated volume, the authors cover a great deal of ground, touching on the migration of Jews to the island, the battle for civil liberties, Jewish life over the centuries and the community's high profile families. But their claim that "this fascinating story has remained untold" is contradicted by the books on Jamaican Jews they cite in their bibliography.

As The Island of One People states, Jews began reaching Jamaica in the late 1500s as Conversos – newly converted Christians – fled the wrath of the Inquisition. With the British conquest in 1655, Jews could live openly as Jews, yet they were subjected to discrimination. Once these obstacles were removed in the 1830s, still more Jews settled in Jamaica. They, in turn, were followed by Sephardi Jews from the Middle East and Ashkenazi Jews fleeing Nazi Germany.

Delevante and Alberga, both born and raised in Jamaica, speculate that the Spanish explorer Christopher Columbus, who may have been a Converso himself, employed several Conversos as crewmen when he paid a brief visit to Jamaica in 1494.

During the Spanish occupation (1509-1655), Jews arriving in Jamaica passed themselves off as Catholics. But when Spain, in 1577, repealed an edict prohibiting Conversos to emigrate to the colonies, the way was open for them to live and trade freely in Jamaica.

With the end of the Spanish occupation, Jews could practise their faith openly and build synagogues. The new British colonial administrators encouraged Jewish immigration, recognizing that Jews could bring expertise in trading, banking and shipping. Many of the Jewish families settling in Jamaica in the 17th and 18th centuries arrived through Amsterdam.

Yet Jews were definitely second-class citizens during this period.

In 1681, the Jamaican House of Assembly enacted a law excluding Roman Catholics, Jews and Jamaicans of African ancestry from exercising their civil rights. In 1695, the legislature passed an act forcing Jews, representing five per cent of the white population, to pay more than their fair share of taxes.

Fiercely anti-Semitic and jealous of the success Jews enjoyed in commerce, British settlers filed a petition to the House of Assembly in 1698 requesting that they be forced to leave Jamaica. The request was denied on the grounds that they were too economically useful to be expelled.

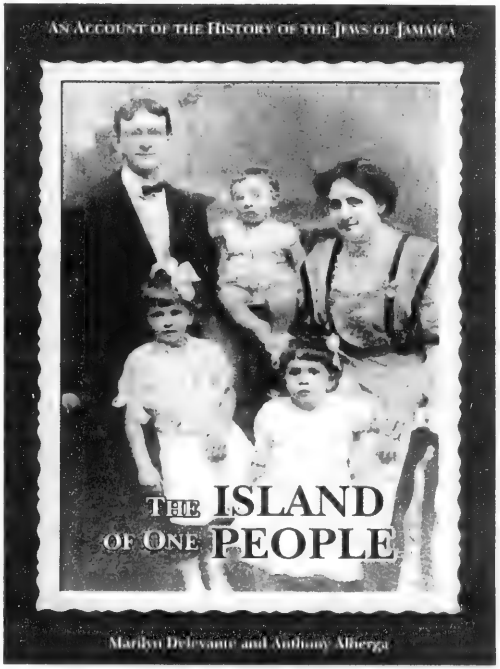
The Plantation Act of 1740, granting Jews various "privileges and advantages," marked an improvement in their status. But it was not until 1826 that a bill was passed giving Jews full equality. Even so, Jews had to wait another five years before the bill was finally promulgated.

Interestingly enough, Delevante and Alberga observe that Jews in Canada were not granted the same political rights as Christians until 1832.

The emancipation of Jamaica Jewry had an impact. By 1849, eight of the 47 members of the House of Assembly were Jewish. It was in that year, too, that the legislature adjourned for Yom Kippur for the first time.

The acceptance of Jews in Anglo-Jamaican society was such that some of the earliest Jewish settlers intermarried and were lost to the community. Families such as the deCordovas, the Harts, the Levys, the Mottas and the deLissers fall into that category.

The deCordovas founded The Gleaner, Jamaica's leading daily newspaper, in 1834. Lewis Ashenheim, the scion of a prominent Jewish family, was chairman of its board from 1909 to 1941. His son, Neville, was Jamaica's first ambassador to the United States.



Apart from the Ashenheims, the most notable Jewish Jamaican families have been the Lindos, who made their fortune as banana planters and then branched into the wine and rum business; the deLissers, who own luxury hotels in Montego Bay; the Myers, who bottle Captain Morgan Rum; the Henriques, who head a construction conglomerate; and the Matalons, who trade in cocoa products, foodstuffs, pharmaceuticals and knitted goods. During the 16th and 17th centuries, a small proportion of Jamaican Jews were in the slave trade.

Jews have also been active in the professions and the arts. Marvin Goodman is a past president of the Jamaican Institute of Architects. Basil Anthony Lindo was appointed general manager and chief executive officer of the Bank of Nova Scotia's Jamaican branches. Maurice Stoppi was chairman of the National Dance Theatre.

Four Jews – Philip Stern, Altamont de Costa, George Seymour-Seymour and Eli Matalon – have served as mayor of Kingston, the island's capital. Matalon was later minister of education and minister of justice in Michael Manley's government.

As of 2002, Jamaica had 250 Jewish inhabitants, comprising 0.0094 per cent of its population. At its peak in the 1880s, the Jewish community had 2,535 members. In 1720, however, 18 per cent of Kingston's white population was Jewish.

The authors ascribe the decline to two factors: assimilation and emigration. Mixed marriages from the 16th century onward had a discernible effect, as did the migration of some families – the Torres', the Gomez's and the Pintos – to Britain, Canada and Panama. One co-author of the book, Alberga, is a resident of Toronto.

As a counterpoint to assimilation, many Jews have preserved their traditions. But during the 20th century, Orthodox Judaism faded away and was replaced by a more progressive and Conservative form of observance.

The Island of One People charts the rise and development of a historic Jewish community, and although Delevante and Alberga are not not professional historians, they have written a credible account of Jamaican Jewry.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 10. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office. E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Please note: submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2006 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 24, 2006. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 2006.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 2006. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

CJN Profile

Lord of the Rings: live on stage

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

"Tolkien is talmudic," professes David Mirvish, head of Mirvish Productions. "He understood the sense of fairness and rightness, of the importance in community."

What inspires Mirvish to such gushing is nothing less than the most expensive stage show in history, at $27 million. His stage adaptation of The Lord of the Rings (LOTR) is primed and ready for a world première in Toronto on March 23, with previews running for five weeks on Feb. 2 at the Princess of Wales Theatre.

In an interview at his office, Mirvish almost appears giddy when he speaks about Tolkien's famous trilogy coming to downtown Toronto. "Nothing has been done on this type of scale before," he says. "I'm calling this epic. It's not a conventional musical."

Mirvish and company have been avoiding the dreaded "m"-word for obvious reasons: ardent LOTR fans cringe at the prospect of prancing Hobbits and Orcs high-stepping to show tunes. To quell those fears, the creative team in Toronto approached The Lord of the Rings with a deep respect for the original text when they adapted the books for the stage.

"And this sure isn't a conventional musical when you have the artistic director inspired by Tom Waits," Mirvish says, before cautioning that musical tastes will span a worldly spectrum.

In fact, it was the music that first convinced Mirvish the Tolkien text was worth adapting. Two years ago, Mirvish heard a sample of the music to be included in the adaptation. Composed by two distinct collaborators – Indian composer A.R. Rahman and Finnish group Värttinä – the music "had an otherworldly quality to it that made me think 'This is magical,'" Mirvish recalls.

The legendary producer, famous for bringing to Toronto The Lion King, Mamma Mia! and The Producers, understood the risk of staging a show as expansive as The Lord of the Rings. But smart gambles have always been part of Mirvish's work schedule. "My credibility is on the line here," he says, half-laughing. "But I'm stepping up to a challenge I've never engaged in before."

The challenge also relates to what Mirvish is risking financially. He invested $1 million of his own money into the production, while also convincing Tourism Toronto and the Ontario government to invest $3 million each. "The government didn't see it as a question of supporting the arts but as a job creation and tourism program," Mirvish points out, adding how the politicians will see a return on their investment by the fourth week of the show – if sales progress as expected.

And Mirvish is convinced the show's grand spectacle won't disappoint. With a cast of 55 and 14 musical numbers, The Lord of the Rings stretches to three hours of battles, music and dance. The set resembles a tree trunk, with movable parts allowing the Fellowship to traverse grassy, rocky or uphill terrain. Special effects colour the fight scenes and creative lighting adds lustre to terrific monsters such as the winged Balrog.

The only standout star in the cast is Tony Award-winning Brent Carver, a Canadian theatre veteran who excels in every role he plays. Another noted actor is Michael Therriault, seen recently in Mirvish's The Producers and playing the slimy Gollum in The Lord of the Rings.

With any spectacle, the music must act as the sweeping soundtrack to the dramatic action. Mini-symphonies carry the battle sequences, and a percussion-heavy number plays during the Helm's Deep sequence.

Quarterbacking the creative component of the show is Kevin Wallace, co-producer and chief architect. When he read an early draft of the stage adaptation by Shaun McKenna in November 2001, he was so impressed by the writing quality he secured the underlying theatre rights. He corralled director Kevin Marchus, designer Rob Howell, musical supervisor Christopher Nightingale and choreographer Peter Darling (of Billy Elliot fame).

"Everyone is working with a clear agenda," Wallace tells The CJN in his office a floor above Mirvish's. "The ultimate strength of the stage adaptation is its clarity."

He aims to sway Tolkien fans who hold preconceived notions. "This will lurch the audience out of their own perception of The Lord of the Rings," he says.

Unlike the film, the show will not ignore key sections of the trilogy in favour of more action-oriented scenes. For instance, Wallace points out, the show "gives a nod to Tom Bombadil," a minor character in the book who helped the Hobbits during their journey across Middle Earth. And when Frodo meets Faramir for the first time, the scene is uneventful but "there's a calm and settled beauty to the writing" the script didn't want to omit, Wallace says.

Wallace is tight-lipped about the more intriguing aspects of the show, including Gollum's final look – "it'll be unlike anything ever conceived," he says – and the special effects concepts. He slyly smiles and admits he wants "to create an air of surprise when the show opens on March 23."

But The CJN has learned a few tidbits worth sharing: as expected, the emotional centre of the story will focus on the Hobbits, especially Frodo the Ring-bearer and his companion, Sam; the massive battle scenes will take up the entire stage; song lyrics will be composed in English and Elvish, Tolkien's created language for his pointy-eared creatures; and Act One will finish with the emergence of the winged creature Balrog, which Wallace claims "will be the talking point at intermission."

But what the world will be talking about in several weeks is Toronto's ability to pull off a monumental show such as The Lord of the Rings. Also important to Mirvish, though, is what the story can do to rally a community. "It's about people caring for each other, all kinds of races coming together to fight evil," he says. "The responsibility is not on the shoulders of the biggest person but on someone who represents the Everyman."

Good versus evil. Frodo versus Sauron. Another Biblical allegory comes to mind but Mirvish isn't saying it. He doesn't need to – David and Goliath, in the form of Hobbits, Orcs and Trolls, is coming to town.

Previews for The Lord of the Rings run Feb. 2 to March 22 at the Princess of Wales Theatre, 300 King St. W. Opening night is March 23. For tickets, call 416-872-1212.

THE LION'S TALE

The following story is adapted from an ancient parable quoted by the post-talmudic commentator, Rav Hai Gaon. Rav Hai Gaon lived about 1,000 years ago in Babylonia, which is now known as Iraq.

Leo the lion was hungry. Very hungry, in fact. Restlessly, he paced back and forth, wondering where to find food. The thought crossed his mind that maybe he should venture into the nearby village and eat someone, but he immediately rejected the idea. Leo still remembered his great-grandfather's warning, "Leo, eat any animals you please, but whatever you do, don't eat humans. Great punishment awaits the lion who eats a human."

Leo was getting desperate. So desperate that he tried eating the tall, thick grass covering the forest floor. "Yuck!" He spat it out, repulsed. What am I thinking? Lions can't eat grass!

I'm going to have to eat a person, he thought, frantically. But I can't! His thoughts tortured him until he found himself walking through the woods toward the village where the people lived. Soon the terrain levelled, and in the distance he could see the huts of the village. Leo surveyed his surroundings. Men were coming home from their day's work. Plumes of smoke rose from the many fire pits scattered throughout the village. The sun would set soon, and all the people would return to their homes. Leo had to act quickly. But his great-grandfather's warning haunted him. How can I do this? he asked himself. And he squatted down on the grass despondently.

"What's the matter, Leo?"

Leo looked up. Sly the Fox was calling him.

"Oh, hello, Sly. The problem is, I'm real hungry."

"Uh oh. I'd better stay away from you. You might eat me."

"Nah, I wouldn't eat a good friend like you." Actually, Leo was so hungry that he would, but he knew that Sly was much too fast for him to catch.

"So what's the problem, Leo? Look around you. All these delicious people just waiting to become your dinner. See, there's a man standing right on the other side of that ditch over there. Can't you imagine how tasty…"

"Oh Sly, don't do that to me. It's bad luck to eat people. Real bad luck."

"What are you talking about?"

"My great-grandfather warned me that great punishment is in store for any lion who eats a person."

"Oh, c'mon, Leo. That's not true anymore. These days it's all buy now, pay later."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that nothing's going to happen to you if you eat him. Your grandchildren will take the punishment, not you."

"Really? How do you know?"

"Leo, foxes know everything."

"Well," said Leo, "That does make sense. I guess I was just being overly fearful."

"So what are you waiting for? It's suppertime!"

Trembling with excitement, Leo silently crept though the tall grass until he reached the ditch separating the man and himself. Then, with a mighty roar, Leo pounced. He shot over the ditch, bearing down on his helpless repast…

Leo never did figure out what went wrong. Maybe his angle was off. Maybe the wind shifted. He smashed into the steep, ragged wall of the ditch and plunged to the bottom. He landed on his leg, and the sudden crack and sharp pain told him he had broken it.

Sly peered over the rim of the ditch.

"Sly! You tricked me! I told you something would happen! You lied to me! You said I wouldn't get any punishment for this!"

"What are you talking about?" replied Sly. I told you that grandchildren get punished for what their grandparents do. "I know what must have happened. Your grandfather must have eaten a person, and you're taking the punishment."

"That's not fair!"

"Oh, all of a sudden, it's not fair."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean, when I told you that your grandchildren would take the punishment instead of you, it made sense to you, but now that you're taking your grandfather's punishment, it's suddenly not fair."

Sly flicked his tail to say goodbye, and vanished.

Brother, sister are Canada's top junior pairs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Last summer, in the middle of training for the figure skating season ahead, Kyra Moscovitch took a bit of a tumble.

During one of the soaring lifts that are part of pairs skaters' routines, she turned awkwardly and came down off balance. When she hit the ice, her skate dug in and wedged next to her brother Dylan's boot. Her body continued to turn, and the resulting torque forces broke her left leg quite badly.

It took two pins in the bone and months of rehab for Kyra, 12, to be ready to resume training. But resume training she did, and a few weeks ago, with only two months of training together, she and big brother Dylan did what they seem to always do: finish first in whatever competition they enter.

Adding to their national pre-novice and novice titles earned in the two previous years, the Moscovitch duo captured the Canadian junior title in pairs skating at the BMO Canadian figure skating championships in Ottawa.

The North York pair scored 143.45 points, ahead of silver medalists Rachel Kirkland and Eric Radford (132.91) and bronze medalists Taylor Steele and Robert Paxton (131.97).

Top of the medal podium is where the Moscovitch team seems most comfortable, so even with only two months to prepare, it would have been premature to write them off.

Dylan, 21, handles most of the questions directed at the pair and he acknowledges the two have an intense desire to compete and win. In fact, he said, by the time he was five,"I wanted to be an Olympic champion."

At the Civic Centre in Ottawa, the two found themselves in third place after their short program, only .61 points behind the leaders.

With a gold medal in sight, the Moscovitches' strengths came to the fore. "I think we won it on our artistry, our energy and our enthusiasm," said Dylan.

As he told the media at the time, "that program just rolled from one element to the next, and it was quite a fun ride."

The duo's signature traits are their dynamism, their speed and the way "we attack into the elements." Add consistency to the mix and the result is,"We're undefeated domestically for the last three years," Dylan said.

Although they've been skating together competitively for only three years, they've been on the ice from a very young age.

Dylan likes to tell the story of his first experience on ice – when he was barely able to walk at 13 months of age. His parents wanted to carry him onto a frozen lake, but local rules required that everyone wear skates.

His parents rented bob (double runner) skates for him, and, voila, he was a skater.

At three, Dylan was enrolled in skating lessons, "and ever since then, I kept going."

At seven, he entered his first competition. He remembers being dressed as a cowboy and performing bunny hops (jumping off the ice for a split second) and waltz jumps (half turn jumps).

As a youngster, he also played hockey for the Parkdale Flames. Because he could skate backward so well, his coach put him on defence. He also played baseball, soccer and other sports.

At 13, with a full load of extracurricular activities to take up all his time, he had to make a decision. He jettisoned most of the other activities and concentrated on figure skating.

As a singles skater, he has finished second nationally in junior men's competition (2004) and he's skated at international Grand Prix events in Japan and Germany. His best international finish was third as a junior at the 2004 Triglav Trophy in Slovenia.

His younger sister, Natasha, 19, skated competitively until she was 13, and brother Mischa, 14, is a competitive tennis player.

Kyra, who stands 5-2 and weights 95 pounds, can't remember a time when skating wasn't part of her life.

"I started skating because I was at the rink even before I was born," she said.

She recalls watching Dylan skate at the West Toronto Skating Club when they lived in the Parkdale neighbourhood of Toronto.

At about 10, Dylan enrolled at other clubs. Until recently, the two skated under the direction of coach Paul Wirtz at the Toronto Cricket, Skating and Curling Club. A variety of choreographers have helped them with their routines: Steven Belanger, Rosella Sousanna and Jackie Peter.

After five years with Wirtz, the Moscovitches switched clubs and coaches, opting for a trial run with coach Lee Barkell at a skating school in Barrie. They're up at 5:45 to make it on time for their 7:15 ice time. They train on the ice for approximately three hours at a time, and sometimes for five hours in the lead-up to competitions.

Kyra makes it back to Toronto by 12:30 to attend Grade 7 classes at St. Andrews Junior High in its high performance athlete program.

Dylan continues to work toward a high school diploma through correspondence school. Because of his training and travel schedule, he's opted for an educational "slow track."

When he's not on the ice, the 5-11, 165-pound skater trains in martial arts with former world figure skating champion Elvis Stojko.

Kyra, meanwhile, still takes gymnastics four times a week, which helps her skating by giving her good "body awareness" during jumps, throws and twists.

With their domination of youth categories all but complete, Dylan and Kyra are looking forward to next season, when they will graduate to seniors, where Canada's very best skaters compete.

"It's exciting," said Dylan. "We're looking forward to it. We're aiming for the top five, but of course we'd love to come as high as possible.

"Our long term goal is Vancouver 2010 [Winter Olympics]."

Israeli skaters finish fifth at Euro championships

Jerusalem Post and CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — The Olympics-bound Israeli ice dance duo of Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovsky finished fifth in the recently concluded 2006 European Championships in Lyon, France.

The two Israelis amassed 188.91 points based on a fifth place finish in the free dance, fifth in compulsory dance and fourth in original dance (short program).

The opening compulsory dance – the Tango Romantica – saw the Israelis earn a 34.79 combined score, worth 20 per cent of the total marks, in spite of a strong performance that elicited praise from the Eurosport commentator, who added that, in his opinion, they should have taken the top spot. They skated to Maurice Ravel's Bolero in the free dance, with the judges again ranking them fifth.

Elena Grushina and Ruslan Goncharov of Ukraine, last year's silver medalists, were first after the compulsories with a 38.82 score, closely followed by the comeback team of Margarita Drobiazko and Povilas Vanagas of Lithuania with 38.34, whose last competition was the 2002 World Championships.

Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovsky

World and European champions Tatiana Navka and Ruslan Goncharov of Russia stood third after the preliminary event, with 38.21 points.

The world champions bounced back with a first in original dance and another first in free dance to capture top spot in the championship, with 202.32 points. Second were Grushina and Goncharov with 196.73 points and the bronze medalists were Drobiazko and Vanagas with 196.18.

Isabelle Delobel and Olivier Schoenfelder of France finished fourth with 194.49 points.

Israel's Alexandra and Roman Zaretsky, a brother-and-sister team, managed a decent placing, finishing 15th overall in their first European performance.

The Zaretskys were born in Minsk, Belarus, but have lived in Israel since the late 1980s. Their best international finish was in the 2004 Harghita Cup in Romania, where they placed second in junior ice dance.

The Zaretskys, as well as Chait and Sakhnovsky, are coached by Evgeni Platov and they train in Montclair, N.J. Platov is a two-time Olympic champion (1994, 1998) in ice dance with partner Oksana Grishuk. Alexander Zhulin also coaches Chait and Sakhnovsky. Zulin is the 1993 world champion and 1994 Olympic silver medalist in ice dance. He skated with Maya Usova.

Chait and Sakhnovsky are the first Israeli skaters to medal at the world championships, winning a bronze in 2002. They finished sixth at the Salt Lake City Olympics that same year. Sakhnovsky was the 1993 world junior champion with partner Ekaterina Svirina, when the Moscow native competed for Russia.

Sakhnovsky and Chait will represent Israel at the Turin Olympics, which will run from Feb. 10 to 26. They will be joined by alpine skier Michael Renzhin, a native of Latvia who grew up in the Ukrainian Carpathian Mountains and who has lived in Israel for about 4½ years.

A living will is no panacea

By DR. MICHAEL GORDON

Harold, a 52-year-old physician, is the spokesperson in his family, and he was struggling with decisions about Moshe, his 88-year-old father who had a malignant blood disorder. Moshe's physician believed that palliative care, with comfort measures only, was appropriate. Harold felt that further blood transfusions, beyond the six Moshe had already received in the past two months, were needed. Harold's three siblings appeared to be going along with him, though perhaps reluctantly. Moshe's wife Rivka said she only wanted "the best" for her husband, but, as might be expected, she deferred to her physician son.

The Senior Side of Life

As the case of Terry Schiavo unfolded last year in the United States, many believed that if she had written a living will (often called an advance directive), the conflict between her husband and her family over her treatment could have been avoided.

Moshe had a living will, one that contained a lot of detail, but the interpretation of what he intended when he wrote about "comfort measures" and "no heroic measures," as well being "allowed to die peacefully," was causing conflict.

Moshe's physician believed that the living will focused on the management of pain and other symptoms. Harold believed that blood transfusions, although not curative, provide comfort, and he wanted them continued for as long as necessary, while recognizing they would not alter the course of his father's terminal condition. He had said, "My father's well-being is what matters most to me, and a blood transfusion is not 'heroic' and provides comfort to him when he gets short of breath because of his anemia."

In this situation, a caring and loving family and a dedicated physician were in conflict over the meaning of a living will. Rather than helping the family agree to a course of action, the living will caused as much trouble as if nothing at all had been written.

Without the document, the same questions about Moshe's care might also have arisen, but no one would have tried to interpret his written words in order to determine treatment. It would have helped had he explained his intentions to his family at the time he wrote his living will, as he had become very sick and suffered from accompanying dementia and could no longer indicate his treatment preferences.

The last thing any caring family wants in an end-of-life situation is conflict, especially if bad feelings after death are the result. For the treating physician, the true wishes of the patient are usually paramount. When the patient cannot indicate them, physicians must rely on surrogate decision-makers who are usually family members. When a living will exists, it's hoped that it will ease the treatment decisions for families and physicians – but as this case indicates, it doesn't always turn out that way.

The resolution is not always easy. A family meeting with the doctor, a social worker and maybe an ethicist might help everyone understand the goals of treatment – which, of course, was to make Moshe's last days or weeks as comfortable as possible.

Respect for his wishes was an important value for the family, so even if he had not explained in detail to anyone why he wrote what he wrote, it appeared that he did not want to suffer. As he indicated in the document, he had a good life and wanted a peaceful end. With that in mind, it was possible for the family and physician to agree to the limits of future blood transfusions and focus instead on other comfort measures.

With that approach, Moshe's last days were comfortable, and the family could agree to support each other, with the help of the physician, during the very important final days of what had been a remarkable life.

Election contained negative lessons

While I found it difficult to make an accurate prediction as to who would win last month's federal election, I can predict, sadly, that there will be one serious consequence of the campaign itself.

Seymour Epstein

Politicians are on the front pages of our newspapers and monopolize our television screens, and they have recently taken over cyberspace as well. That's been the case under normal circumstances, but the recent campaign only exaggerated a situation in which these "honourable" men and women have become models of public behaviour for our youth – the very young people who will be running for office and running our country in a few decades.

Many, if not most, of the candidates for office chose to denigrate the other parties and personalities as an alternative to stating their own positive positions. While this practice is usually part of any election, the decision of the four major parties to make it the main motif of their campaigns set a new low in the ethics of rhetoric.

As is always the case, once a norm is lowered, there is always someone who will drag it into the gutter. And it's also a truth of our culture that once something becomes permitted, it soon becomes obligatory, and, of course, super-sized. And so, our young people who should be learning responsible government and prophetic leadership from our politicians instead are seeing daily ads – a powerful influence on untrained minds – that aggressively denigrate others while saying little that is credible about the positive goals of any one party.

There have been some exceptions, but in this campaign, they have proven the rule that negative rhetoric is acceptable – a lesson we hope our children will reject. And they will, if schools, youth groups and family dinner discussions over-teach (a new term I've just invented!) the ancient Jewish rejection of lashon hara, the slanderous tongue. Our biblical and rabbinic texts are filled with law and legend that make it abundantly clear that the wonder of human speech is equally capable of the highest mitzvot or the gravest of sins.

Our children need to see in us models of the very best we have to offer, not the very worst of someone else.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

And the winners are…

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

What this town needs is a little pizzazz. I am, therefore, launching the Yasher Koach (Yiddish for "way to go") Awards (YKAs) to give us some hometown naches (pride), fun and entertainment.

The YKAs are my own invention and are metaphorically presented to fellow Jews, companies or organizations who have brought spirit and growth to the Toronto Jewish community in 2005/5675/6.

URBAN WRITER

The following are some of my nominees/winners.

For Rabbi of the Year, I nominate Rabbi Phil Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, a decent man who has lead his flock for many years with grace and fortitude.

Rabbi Lawrence Englander and his wife Cheryl of Solel Congregation in Mississauga deserve a nomination for Pre-eminent Rabbinical Couple in an Outlying Area, for building this 300-family shul into a bastion of hearty Jewish activism with an abundance of community warmth.

Rabbi Yossi Sapurman of Beth Torah Congregation and Eli Rubenstein of Congregation Habonim are nominated for their innovative spiritual leadership and for illuminating their shuls with their shining neshamas (souls).

Rabbi Debra Landsberg of Temple Emanu-El gets the Rabbinical Fruitfulness YKA for being the only spiritual leader whose water broke in 2005. She subsequently delivered triplets.

How about a YKA for Best Kosher Eatery? CJN policy discourages the mention of company names in columns, so I'll simply say that there is a fellow in town who owns five kosher restaurants, ranging from one that serves only dairy cuisine to one that specializes in late-night fine dining. He walks away hands down with the YKA for Jewish Gastronomic Inventiveness.

There's also a new place on Eglinton Avenue with an ambiance that my zaide would have said is "nice enough for the goyim." I nominate it for the Evolving from the Shtetl award.

My first nomination for the Community Leaders of the Year YKA is Darryl Borden, director of Ve'ahavta's homeless initiatives. Darryl operates in the streets with a raw enthusiasm and determination that's solidly grounded in the principle of tikkun olam (repairing the world). Simon Kalkstein, a social worker and supervisor of the downtown branch of Jewish Family & Child Service, is "the read deal" and shares the nomination for helping more Jews in need than there are seeds in a pomegranate.

Other YKA nominees are Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, who diligently worked his way through the ranks of various community organizations, paid his dues, and has taken us to a higher level of fundraising and community development.

I also nominate Avi Benlolo, the director of the Canadian office of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, who has developed the right tools to enhance the profile of his organization and has [illegible] its mission statement with dogged tenacity.

The YKA for Courage to Take a Stand would have to go to Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University, who regularly expresses dovish sentiments about the Middle East peace process in a generally hawkish community. Yossi Adler, a Toronto lawyer, shares this YKA for a recent gutsy column in The CJN that challenged prominent haredi rabbis who ostracized a haredi scholar, Rabbi Nosson Slifkin, for trying to reconcile science and Torah using traditional sources.

Other YKA nominations could include Best Anti-Semite Buster (say, B'nai Brith's Frank Dimant versus Canadian Jewish Congress' Bernie Farber); Best Shabbat Service; Greatest Synagogue Shammas (sexton); Most Inspiring Jewish Family; Funkiest Jewish Artist; and Most Rockin' Jewish Activist.

Please e-mail me your nominations for other YKA awards (and the reason for your nominations). I'll try to publish some of the results. Yasher koach to all those nominated, and all those who should have been. On their behalf, I'd like to thank the (Jewish) academy, their parents and, most importantly, God.

Israel applauds IAEA decision

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel has officially welcomed a resolution passed last Saturday by the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to refer Iran to the United Nations Security Council.

The response came Saturday even though a clause in the resolution states that "a solution to the Iranian issue would contribute to global non-proliferation efforts and to realizing the objective of a Middle East free of weapons of mass destruction, including their means of delivery."

Diplomatic officials in Israel were not concerned about the clause, which is believed to be an indirect reference to Israel, saying that it has no real operative meaning and that the most important thing is to get the Iranian nuclear issue referred to the Security Council, something Israel had been advocating for months.

Atomic watchdog refers Iran to Security Council

The IAEA reported Iran to the Security Council because it fears the Iranian regime wants to produce nuclear arms. The move, which raised the stakes in the diplomatic confrontation already underway over the Iranian program, prompted Tehran to threaten immediate retaliation.

The resolution links the decision to ask for Tehran's referral to the Security Council to the country's breaches of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and lack of confidence in Iran's claim that it is not trying to make weapons.

The text expresses "serious concerns about Iran's nuclear program." It recalls "Iran's many failures and breaches of its obligations" with regard to the non-proliferation treaty. It expresses "the absence of confidence that Iran's nuclear program is exclusively for peaceful purposes."

It asks IAEA director general Mohamed ElBaradei to report to the Security Council with steps Iran needs to take to dispel suspicions about its nuclear ambitions.

These include that it return to freezing uranium enrichment, consider stopping construction of a heavy-water reactor that could be

Canada reviews aid after Hamas win

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada is re-examining its development aid to the Palestinian Authority after the shocking landslide win by Hamas in last month's Palestinian parliamentary elections.

Observers say Canada, like other western democracies, is realizing that it cannot morally or legally fund an organization that it considers to be an outlawed terrorist group.

Last week's announcement by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) – the federal agency that plans and implements most of Canada's aid funding– that it was reviewing its aid to the PA came as Paul Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank, said the bank should continue delivering aid to the West Bank and Gaza despite Hamas' victory.

At the same time, European Union bureaucrats and foreign ministers reportedly held a flurry of meetings and consultations aimed at recrafting their aid package to the Palestinian Authority.

Wolfowitz told the Financial Times that the World Bank was operating in Palestinian areas at the request of the so-called Mideast Quartet of the United Nations, United States, Russia and the European Union.

Nazi Label Decried

ST. CATHARINES, Ont. — A magazine article that likened opponents of a controversial 100-metre-high condominium project to Nazis and its supporters to Jews is drawing criticism in Port Dalhousie, a historic lakeside hamlet that's now part of St. Catharines, Ont. Titled "A NIMBY Primer," the unsigned article appeared in the January issue of the Port Dalhousie Peer, whose editor, tower supporter David Serafino, would not answer queries from the St. Catharines Standard. "Developers are to NIMBYs what Jews were to Nazis," the piece's unnamed author wrote, adding that tower opponents are using Nazi-like tactics to vilify project backers. Anglican Minister Alan Minarcik said the article "borders on anti-Semitism." Len Rudner of Canadian Jewish Congress, called it "tasteless and stupid."

Manor Gets Reprieve

JERUSALEM — Boaz Manor, the Israeli co-founder of failed hedge fund Portus Alternative Management will remain free while Israel's Supreme Court hears his appeal of an order that he turn in $9 million (US) in diamonds, allegedly bought with investors' funds, or face jail, the Globe and Mail reported. Manor, who faces securities charges in Ontario and fled to Israel last March after Portus went bankrupt, had missed a deadline issued by a Tel Aviv judge to turn in the diamonds. Receiver KPMG wants him to account for $800 million (Cdn) of the firm's assets.

Shoah Cash Allocated

NEW YORK — Money from the "Hungarian Gold Train" settlement has been distributed to social service agencies to benefit Holocaust survivors. The Claims Conference has doled out $4.2 million (US) to 27 social service agencies – including Circle of Care in Toronto, the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors in Montreal, and UIA Federations Canada – and will give the same amount for the next five years. Details are available at www.claimscon.org. The settlement comes from the U.S. government in the case of a trainload of Hungarian Jewish-owned goods, looted by the Nazis and confiscated by U.S. troops in World War II.

Chavez Meets Jews

CARACAS — Venezuela's president met with local Jewish officials after being accused of making remarks some consider anti-Semitic. Freddy Pressner, president of the Venezuelan Confederation of Israelite Associations, said he believes Hugo Chavez's remarks were not anti-Semitic, Reuters reported. In a speech in late December, Chavez said that while the world offers riches to all, "minorities such as the descendants of those who crucified Christ" have become "the owners of the riches of the world." The Simon Wiesenthal Center said the remarks were a veiled attack on Jews. Chavez insists he was referring to wealthy elites and not to Jews.

Hate Incidents Drop

LONDON — Anti-Semitic incidents decreased by 14 per cent in Britain in 2005, according to a new report. The decrease is mainly due to a decrease in the number of threats from 2004, according to the report, released by the Community Security Trust, a Jewish group. Among violent assaults, there were 82 reported incidents in 2005, down one from the historically high number in 2004.

Tory's Loss Blamed on Jewish Media Owners

VANCOUVER — Tory officials and defeated candidate Darrel Reid were distancing themselves last month from Reid's former campaign manager, who said the Jewish-owned CanWest media empire has a liberal bias against socially conservative Christians like Reid.

Robbie Robertson made the remarks on election night to the CanWest-owned Richmond News. "The CanWest Global media empire is controlled by a Jewish family, and they have been the most aggressive family to attack Christians, especially Conservative Christians," Robertson said in explaining some of the challenges faced by Reid's campaign.

Reid, who lost in the suburban Vancouver riding of Richmond to Liberal incumbent Raymond Chan, dismissed the comments and said Robertson was on medical leave from the campaign when he made them.

CanWest also owns the Global TV network, as well as the Vancouver Sun, Vancouver Province and the National Post. All three papers endorsed the Tories in the election.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith both strongly condemned Robertson's comments.

Hillel seeks name change for 'Israel Apartheid Week'

Program to be held at U of T

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As the Arab Students' Collective was busy making arrangements to hold its second Israel Apartheid Week at the University of Toronto, Hillel was in close talks with the school to have the name of the event changed.

"It's the name that we take issue with. That's what we find offensive," said Tilly Shames, Israel affairs director for Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Last year, part of the controversy surrounding Israel Apartheid Week, a week-long series of anti-Israel lectures and events, was that it was scheduled to coincide with Hillel's annual IsraelFEST. The move was seen as a deliberate attempt to divert attention from the Hillel event, which aimed to promote Israeli arts and culture.

Other Jewish groups, such as B'nai Brith Canada, were urging U of T to cancel Israel Apartheid Week on the grounds it would create a dangerous environment for Jewish students, but Hillel decided against that approach and acknowledged the right of other groups to hold campus events.

This year, Hillel is once again not trying to have the Feb. 13-17 event cancelled, but it has asked U of T's office of student affairs to change its name to omit the word "apartheid."

"Hillel of Greater Toronto has worked very closely with the university to have the name changed, and we are in constant communication," Shames said.

"We have let our feelings be known that the name of the event won't create a positive atmosphere on campus," said Hagai Kuperman, president of Hillel at U of T.

But he added that only the university has the power to decide if the name should be changed.

A decision had not been made at The CJN's deadline. Calls and e-mails to U of T's office of student affairs were not returned.

"Extremist programming is not where the students are today," Shames said. "It's unfortunate, because it taints the university experience when students are exposed to extremism."

While Hillel has focused its energy on having the name changed, Shames said she is also concerned by material the Arab Students' Collective may present.

Last year, there were many complaints from Jewish students when a mock refugee camp was constructed on campus and posters were put up promoting the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade, the military wing of the Fatah movement that is responsible for suicide bombings in Israel, she said.

Avi Benlolo, Canadian director of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, also believes that associating the word apartheid with Israel is a major concern to Jewish staff and students on campus.

"While the name of the event is one of the greater issues, we are also concerned about the advertising throughout the campus. Seeing the name will register in the minds of students that Israel is an apartheid state, and that is an issue," Benlolo said.

He said the university needs to re-evaluate what it finds permissible.

"I do not think the event is productive. I don't think it fosters peace. It isn't accurate and misinformation being applied is a complete fabrication of what Israel really is – a first-world democracy."

In response to Israel Apartheid Week, the Simon Wiesenthal Center, in partnership with Betar Tagar, a Zionist campus group, organized a series of lectures called Know Radical-Islam Week, which began Feb. 6 and runs until Feb. 10.

Topics included civil rights in radical Islamic societies and the threat of radical Islamic terrorism.

"It is obvious that this is a direct response to Israel Apartheid Week. We are running it a week before. We can't take this lying down. The Arab Students' Collective is growing and they are transplanting Israel Apartheid Week to other universities. Not responding to this event is not working," Benlolo said.

Herzliya Conference (3)

The Sixth Herzliya Conference on the Balance of Israel's National Security that concluded on Jan. 24 was an ambitious, intense 84-hour immersion into a constantly reverberating echo chamber of seminars, lectures, debates, discussions and speeches on some 30 different subjects bearing upon Israel's overall security.

One of the panel discussions that attracted a great deal of media attention, not surprisingly, was titled "The Nuclearization of Iran."

The international community – and it is important to add, not only the West – is highly suspicious of Iran's true intentions regarding its nuclear program. The peaceful purposes, which the Iranian regime repeatedly proclaims to be the sole reason for developing nuclear energy, are inconsistent with the country's secretive, prevaricating behaviour and its known foreign policy objectives.

That suspicion was expressed last weekend, in the vote by the 35-nation board of the United Nations atomic energy agency in Vienna to report Iran to the Security Council, a procedure that may eventually lead to punitive measures against the theocratic regime in Tehran by the international community.

The resolution passed by a vote of 27 to 3, with five abstentions. Cuba, Syria and Venezuela voted against the European-drafted resolution. Three Muslim countries, it is significant to note, Algeria, Indonesia and Libya, joined Belarus and South Africa in abstaining. They too realize that the acquisition by Iran of nuclear weapons is a threat to the stability of the entire Middle East and beyond.

Most military and political officials in Israel regard Iran as an existential threat to the Jewish state's existence. On the opening night of the conference, Israel's Minister of Defence Shaul Mofaz urged Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to heed the lessons of history before he considered attempting to harm the Jewish state.

History, however, is not likely much of a priority in the curriculum of Iranian schools, given that Ahmadinejad will soon be hosting a conference to examine the nature of the proof for the Holocaust.

On the subject of the nuclearization of Iran, the conference heard from a number of veteran individuals experienced in defence matters generally and involved in the worrisome Iranian conundrum specifically.

The three-person panel comprised Philippe Errera, the deputy director of the Centre d'Analyse et de Prévision at the French ministry of foreign affairs; Sir Michael Quinlan, a guest lecturer at the department of war studies, Kings College, London; and Maj.-Gen. (res.) Isaac Ben-Israel, head of the security studies program at Tel Aviv University.

Errera was part of the European Union (EU) team that has been dealing with Iran. He pointed out that the Iran dossier was the first time the EU had taken on a security challenge with worldwide implications, acknowledging at the same time that the credibility of the EU is at stake.

"A multilateral consensus was indispensible," he said. "And if the matter proceeds to the Security Council, action must result. But we are just at the beginning of what will be a long confrontation."

Sir Michael generally echoed Errera's overall point of view but warned against any military option to the situation. Broad and economic sanctions were the ultimate instruments to be deployed against Iran, Quinlan suggested. But before sanctions are deployed, "the Iranian regime must know precisely what the nature of the sanctions would be."

Quinlan also suggested that for the sake of regional safety, Israel would eventually have to negotiate an appropriate status for its nuclear capacity as well.

Ben-Israel seemed to have little patience with Quinlan's cool, studied advice. "Jewish history prevents Israel from disregarding Iran's statements," he said.

The ensuing discussion between the audience and the members of the panel was quite lively. No consensus emerged.

Labor Party member of Knesset (MK) Ephraim Sneh expressed the hope that a diplomatic embargo might encourage Iranians to change the regime in Tehran. "But if we are talking about another option [namely military], we must prepare it with all reasonable urgency."

Likud MK Arieh Eldad was unequivocal. "The West must know that if they do not act [against Iran], then we will. The world must know that we will not be parties to a second Shoah."

Some people in the audience were less sanguine than Eldad about Israel's capability to pre-emptively eliminate the Iranian nuclear threat. The multi-facility configuration of Iran's nuclear establishment was more complex than that of the single-facility Iraqi station in 1981.

"Israeli policy must be anchored in reality, not in indignation," someone from the audience pleaded.

The last word on the subject of a possible Israeli strike against Iran's nuclear reactors came from the army's chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz. "When the situation reaches the stage that will require a response from us, we will know what to do."

Iran announced on the weekend that it was suspending all co-operation with the IAEA. Some people quickly pointed out there has been no honest co-operation to date anyway from Iran.

The situation grows tenser and more complicated. — MBD

VIOLENCE AT AMONA

Some 50 police officers and 200 protesters, including three Knesset members, were hurt last week as police moved in to dismantle an illegal cluster of houses at Amona near Ofra in the West Bank. Hundreds of youths who had barricaded themselves at the hilltop outpost threw rocks and other debris at the police units. Some people accused the police of acting with too heavy a hand. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert refused the call for a special inquiry into the violence of the evacuation. On Sunday, tens of thousands of people at Zion Square in Jerusalem demonstrated their opposition to Olmert and to his decisions about Amona. [Israpet photo]

Fighter pilot discusses aftermath of Gaza pullout

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Omer Theori, a fighter pilot in the Israeli Air Force who remains a captain in the reserves, spoke at Congregation B'nai Torah last week about the social and security problems facing Israel in the wake of last summer's Gaza pullout.

"As you all know, something like 8,000 Jews were told, 'You don't live here anymore and that maybe you'll have other houses somewhere else, but here you won't,'" said Theori, who served for two years as an F-16 fighter pilot in the IDF's most elite flight squadron.

"The security problems of the disengagement were clear to everybody. I don't think that someone thought that once we disengage that all the terrorism will stop."

He added that not only did the terror not stop, but Palestinians began to shoot missiles from the same places Jews had been removed from.

"I think Hamas won the election because of the disengagement, in my opinion. The disengagement made [Palestinians] believe that terrorism helped them reach their goal," he said.

Theori, who was critical of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to leave Gaza, said he still followed his orders despite his skepticism that the plan would benefit Israel.

He said social issues – the fact the Gaza settlers received very little help, understanding or compassion after the disengagement – are a much bigger problem than security and defence.

He recalled having a conversation with one of his friends just days before the settlements were to be dismantled.

"He asked me, 'What is the problem in moving houses? I've moved three times. Why is everyone making so much noise about moving out?'

"When he asked me this question, I started to realize that the problem here is that people that surround me didn't know what is Gush Katif and didn't understand what was happening."

Theori said that he was asked to prepare soldiers who would be responsible for physically removing people from their homes for what they were about to do.

"They understand technically what they are going to do, they understand their orders… but they were never in Gush Katif and they don't understand what they are going to do."

During a question-and-answer period, a man in the audience said the majority of people in Israel simply don't care about Gazans who were forced to leave their homes and are now crying in hotel rooms and facing unemployment.

The questioner asked how Israel can address this division between the people who are suffering and those who ignore them.

Theori said the key to improving the social problems that arose because of the pullout is to create awareness about how settlers have been affected by the move.

"There is no magic answer to this question, but part of the answer is that we have to learn the lesson of this," he said.

Theori talked mostly about the disengagement, but he also took some time to discuss his involvement with the Mechina yeshiva program in the northern Negev.

Theori – who is shomer Shabbat, a rarity among fighter pilots, who are often on call on Saturdays – is a lay leader of the three-year-old preparatory program, which gives directionless youth the resources to succeed in Israeli society.

The program is based in a poor town called Kiryat Malachi, where most of the residents are recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia.

Canadian travel to Israel continues to recover

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The number of Canadians heading to Israel rose by 17 per cent in 2005, part of a continuing rebound in tourism for the Jewish state.

Overall, the number of travellers to Israel jumped by 27 per cent in 2005, building on gains in 2004 and marking a major reversal from the height of the Palestinian intifadah, when Israeli tourism suffered from a dramatic falloff of visitors.

More than 1.9 million visitors travelled to Israel last year, the Israel Government Tourism Office (IGTO) reported. The United States was the single largest source of tourists to Israel, with 457,500 arriving in 2005, a 21 per cent increase over 2004.

Some 50,800 Canadians, not including an additional 10,000 to 15,000 who also hold other passports, visited the Jewish state in 2005.

An improved security situation and the rediscovery of Israel as a world class tourist destination contributed to the Canadian increase, said Jerry Adler, marketing and public relations manager of IGTO Canada. The Jewish community provided the bulk of Israel-bound travellers, Adler noted, but Christian pilgrims also increased, many buoyed by the late Pope John Paul II's pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

Israel's Ministry of Tourism predicts tourism to Israel in 2006 will come back in line with the booming pre-intifadah years. Travel to Israel nosedived in late 2001 as suicide bombings and attacks on restaurants and cafes dissuaded many from visiting.

"I expect the positive trend to continue through 2006," said Israeli Tourism Minister Avraham Hirchson in a news release. "We hope to welcome three million tourists this year."

Stanley Morais, general manager of El Al's Canadian office, said that "2005 was an exceptional year for us at El Al. El Al turned a profit even with high fuel costs."

Peter Fitzpatrick, a spokesperson for Air Canada, said that "2005 was better for us than 2004, and the trend looks good for 2006. We're encouraged and pleased with it."

Air Canada flies to Israel daily from mid-April to early November and five times a week during the rest of the year.

El Al's chronically money-losing Toronto to Tel Aviv route, which cost-cutters at El Al's head office have been eyeing for years, did particularly well, registering approximately a 20 per cent increase over 2004. The route's overall load factor reached 90 per cent in 2005, including passengers who originated in Los Angeles, Morais said.

El Al offers five flights a week from Los Angeles to Toronto to Tel Aviv during the winter season, six flights a week in the spring and fall seasons, and the airline adds three Toronto to Tel Aviv flights in the summer high season, for a total of nine weekly flights.

During the summer high season, El Al flights to and from Israel were 95 per cent full, Morais said. The airline's market research showed that more than 80 per cent of its Canadian passengers who flew to Israel originated in Toronto.

"The Jewish community in Toronto has very strong ties to Israel," he said. "During the height of the intifadah, the Jewish organizations, especially led by [UJA Federation of Greater Toronto], was relentless in sending trips to Israel on a monthly basis, and it remained a key issue for the people of Toronto to be in Israel at a difficult time.

"Now that the situation has been quieted down, the Jewish community recognized the importance of travelling to Israel and that it's a great place to visit."

Morais said the birthright israel program, which brings young adults to Israel for 10-day visits, has created a multiplier effect, as hundreds of families are picking up on their children's enthusiasm and planning visits. In addition, fares dropped an average of seven per cent in 2005.

Despite the boost in travel to Israel from Canada during 2005, the Toronto route only broke even, Morais continued. On Jan. 1, Toronto's Pearson airport became the most expensive airport in the world for airlines, with carriers paying $14,000 to land a 747 jumbo jet. El Al's 767s are charged about $7,000, and they land twice a day, he noted.

Based on early bookings, El Al is forecasting a decrease in passenger traffic in 2006. As a result, it will be dropping one of its nine weekly summer flights, Morais said.

Morais said Israel's Ministry of Tourism dropped the ball in 2005 by failing to adequately promote travel to Israel. Morais, who worked for four years as the IGTO's deputy director, said the IGTO operated under budgetary constraints in early 2005 – when families plan their 2006 trips – and so missed an opportunity to sell Israel during the current year.

Adler said Morais' comment is "wrong. We are in the throes of a major advertising campaign across Canada, in the hundreds of thousands of dollars… to encourage travel to Israel."

Adler distinguished between the IGTO as an arm of the government of Israel and El Al, a private corporation.

"They have their own problems. That's all I am going to say."

CJPAC claims success after federal election

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When CJPAC, the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, was created weeks before the election was called, its advocates said it could be judged by whether it could mobilize members of the Jewish community to become actively involved in the coming campaign.

Josh Cooper

With the national vote now in the books, CJPAC executive director Josh Cooper said the new organization met its objectives.

CJPAC's success, he said, can be measured by the extent to which politically motivated Jews joined campaigns, hosted coffee parties for candidates, displayed lawn signs, and canvassed by phone and door to door, as well as voted.

Furthermore, Cooper added, CJPAC proved itself an effective resource for many candidates, who called and requested information about issues of interest to the Jewish community, such as a definition of the term "occupied territories," or whether Israel's security barrier was properly termed a fence or a wall.

At the heart of CJPAC's agenda for the recent campaign was to get Jews involved in politics for the parties of their choice. The organization did not favour one party over another, nor did it instruct its members to work for any particular candidate or against another, Cooper said.

Organization helped Jews become politically active to have influence on issues

CJPAC is an independent organization with a 12-person board whose activities are funded by non-tax-deductible donations. An earlier entity, CIJA-PAC, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) Public Affairs Committee, was a UIA-supported group that was also headed by Cooper and is now defunct.

He acknowledged that CJPAC and CIJA-PAC, which was partly funded by charitable dollars, share "an overlap in membership, but it is not entirely similar."

He added that their mandates were also similar, "as they were both developed to encourage participation in the political process. However, because CIJA-PAC was partially funded by charitable dollars, it could only encourage participation in the political process. At CJPAC, we placed people directly in the political process, especially during the recent election."

CJPAC currently has more than 3,000 members, with major Jewish population centres represented.

"CJPAC does not donate money to candidates, political parties or leadership campaigns," Cooper said. "CJPAC does not rate or endorse candidates for political office."

At the heart of CJPAC's strategy is the belief that by helping Jews to become politically active, they can have influence on issues of concern to the Jewish community.

The first step was to get CJPAC members working on campaigns. In the long term, it means planting seeds among Canada's political class that will one day bear fruit through a more sympathetic attitude to Israel and an appreciation of other issues, such as community security, terrorism and anti-Semitism.

CJPAC is merely asking Canadian Jews to be "good citizens and be part of the political process," Cooper added.

Nelson Wiseman, a professor of political science at the University of Toronto, said he has not heard of CJPAC but believes its approach "is perfectly kosher."

"It's part of a healthy civil society," he said.

Wiseman said Sikhs have rallied to get various members of that community elected to public office, but they do not favour one particular party. "That's effective," he said.

Jews, he continued, "are more politically involved than the Canadian average," in part due to the higher education level of Jews as well as due to an ancient prophetic tradition that has led to social consciousness.

By supporting different parties, "it tells people you are part of the Canadian political community and were not dictating what strand of the ideological spectrum you're trying to embrace," he added.

Cooper said the recent election saw the involvement of many university and high school students and "first timers."

They shared a general consensus on a number of issues. Critics of the Jewish state were not likely to embrace CJPAC, he suggested.

With the election over, CJPAC's mission is to keep people interested in politics in their local ridings. "The long term goal is to develop relationships with elected officials and to engage the community in the political system between and during elections," Cooper stated.

We are all Danes!

Aggrieved masses of Muslims razed the Danish embassies in Damascus and Beirut over the weekend. They were expressing their deep sense of affront at the publication of a number of cartoon caricatures of the prophet Muhammad in the Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten in September and reprinted in various European media last week.

Any visual depiction of Muhammad is prohibited under Islamic law and offensive to Muslim sensibility. Satire and caricature, therefore, are egregiously more offensive. As a result, in cities around the world last weekend, Muslims expressed their profound anger that anyone would deign to draw, let alone ridicule, the prophet.

Most of the demonstrations were non-violent, if noisy. Some were quite ugly, as in London, where protesters called alternatively for the "beheading," "slaying," "butchering," or "extermination" of "those who insult Islam." In Beirut and Damascus, as mentioned, the demonstrations were brutishly violent.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has ordered his government to study cancelling all trade contracts with European countries whose newspapers published the caricatures. He said the drawings showed the "impudence and rudeness" of Western newspapers against the prophet, as well as the "maximum resentment of the Zionists [Jews] ruling these countries against Islam and Muslims."

Mahmoud Zahar, leader of Hamas, the Palestinian terror group that last week won the general elections in the Palestinian territories, told the Italian daily Il Giornale that the cartoonists should be punished by death. "We should have killed all those who offend the Prophet, and instead, here we are, protesting peacefully," he said.

Between the actions of the satirists, however, and the reactions of the aggrieved is a distance– indeed, a void – so profoundly wide that we in and of the West cannot cross it.

Let us ignore, for the sake of argument, the hypocrisy of the angry Muslims who rage at the Danish cartoons, yet happily abide grotesque anti-Jewish depictions almost on a daily basis in their own media. Let us also ignore the otherwise relevant fact that non-Muslims need not feel bound by the strictures of Islamic law, however compelling and prudent the courtesy of being respectful. But we cannot – dare not – ignore the life-affirming values of Western society that lead us to ask: how is the burning of embassies, or the call to "behead" and to "slay," not a greater offence to God than an ill-advised, thoughtless, insensitive attempt to depict His prophet?

Muslim extremists have singled out Denmark and the Danes for vituperation. In their struggle against extremism, hatred, intolerance and violence, we should show Danes that they are not alone. We join them in donning the "yellow star" of their vilification, as the king of Denmark did for Jews in World War II.

We are all Danes in this epochal struggle.

'Israel Apartheid Week'

The Arab Students' Collective at the University of Toronto will be hosting its second annual "Israel Apartheid Week" on campus starting Feb. 13. To be sure, Israel is not a perfect state, but like all other democracies, it strives to improve itself and reduce racial and ethnic stratification. But to label Israel an apartheid state is immoral and unethical. It's a complete fabrication and gross mischaracterization of a first-world democracy.

A recent report by the Economist Intelligence Unity (EIU) ranked 20 countries on 15 indicators of political and civil liberty. The Index of Political Freedom lists Israel first, followed by Lebanon, Morocco, Iraq and the Palestinian Territories as the most democratic countries in the Middle East.

According to the index, Israel had the best marks for the following "freedom indicators": election of head of government, election of parliament, fairness of electoral laws, right to organize political parties, power of elected representatives, presence of an opposition, transparency, minority participation, level of corruption, freedom of assembly, independence of the judiciary, freedom of the press, religious freedom, rule of law and property rights.

The U of T Arab group believes that "a just and peaceful solution can only come about through an end to the Israeli military occupation of Palestine, the reversal of Israeli policies of apartheid, and allowing the return of the Palestinian refugees... These demands can only come about through international understanding of and mobilization against the Israeli apartheid regime in the form of boycotts, divestment and sanctions."

The university is celebrated as a bastion of freedom of expression and for its true reflection of the values esteemed by western democracies. These values should be preserved. But we deplore the hijacking of campuses to radicalize students and faculty and attempt to influence the public at large with patently false misinformation.

As a counterbalance to Israel Apartheid Week and as a way of providing U of T students with a fuller, truer picture, the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center and the student advocacy group Betar Tagar will be hosting Know Radical Islam Week, starting Feb. 6.

With the transplanting of Israel Apartheid Week to other universities across Canada and Europe, it's time for people of good conscience who espouse virtues of liberal democracy and civil rights to politely ask the organizers to look in the mirror.

Community demographics

I also applaud the wonderful work done by the Taglit-birthright israel program over the past six years and the support given to it by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and private philanthropists ("UJA Federation supports birthright israel," letters, CJN, Feb. 2). What Leo Davids was trying to point out in "World Jewry today" (CJN, Jan. 5) is that despite the valiant ongoing efforts of organizations such as birthright, the Jewish birthrate in the Diaspora continues to fall. As Davids wrote, "donations are still supporting business as usual, rather than innovative programs to cope with this crisis. Something significant needs to be done about the community's demographics, and soon." "Jewish Singles World," despite endorsements by the Conservative and Reform rabbinate in the Greater Toronto Area, still remains unfunded. Won't someone support us, before it's too late?

Bill 27 and beit dins

There is a notable omission in the article "Jewish groups say new bill targets beit dins" (CJN, Jan. 26). Canadian Jewish Congress honorary legal counsel Mark Freiman was joined by the associate national chair of CJC's executive, Rachael Turkienicz, in our submission to the committee that is reviewing Bill 27.

This is of particular note because a portion of CJC's submission quoted in the article, but not attributed, was ably presented by Turkienicz. In part, she stated: "If the concern of this legislation is to ensure that all parties are treated fairly and with one legal standard, the legislation should consider regulating arbitration and family law to protect the rights of the potentially vulnerable and support their choices of expression. Faith tribunals are empowered by their faith communities. They will continue to be sought after by people of faith as a trusted venue for resolution. As a Canadian, it is important to support each person's personal choice of the lens through which they prefer to see Canadian principles expressed. Rather than removing the support of the government, CJC believes that the legislation should stand strongly beside any woman who chooses to express herself through her faith, knowing she need never compromise her Canadian sensibilities."

Turkienicz echoed CJC's overall approach on this legislation. The protection of women's rights and equality are paramount considerations. At the same time it is crucial that we don't focus on issues that effectively have the state controlling matters of conscience, while doing nothing to advance protection against potential abuses that we all agree must be prevented.

The Tu b'Shvat seder

By SHARON KANON
IPS

Almond blossoms are part of nature's wondrous language, telling us that the gloomy, short days of winter are coming to an end and that most of Israel's winter rains have fallen. The blossoms, like a wake-up call, signal the start of a new planting season.

Tu b'Shvat, the 15th day of the Hebrew month of Shvat, is the official day for celebrating the New Year of the Trees. As a holiday, first mentioned in the Mishnah, it is a late bloomer, only coming into full flower with the Zionist return to Israel. Focusing on the land and its fruits, our return to our roots and Eretz Yisrael, it is customary on Tu b'Shvat to eat a variety of fresh and dried fruits and nuts. Only in recent years, however, has the Tu b'Shvat seder grown in popularity in both Israel and the Diaspora.

Girl with a Flower by Shmuel Schlesinger (1901-1986), oil on canvas, painted in the 1950s.

In the 16th century, Kabbalists (mystics) in Safed enriched the holiday by creating a Tu b'Shvat seder, modelled on the Pesach seder that included four cups of wine, four questions, specific foods and storytelling. They believed that eating different fruits, each preceded by a blessing, was a tikkun, or correction in the metaphysical order of the world according to the Kabbalah, that could have a positive influence on the year's produce. Over time, different communities have added their own customs, and the Tu b'Shvat seder – which now also has its own Haggadah and often includes contemporary Hebrew poetry and song – has developed into a unique expression of appreciation for the land.

Although there are different versions of the Tu b'Shvat seder, most follow the same pattern. Like the Passover seder, the Tu b'Shvat seder calls for four glasses of wine, the drinking of which is preceded by the blessing for wine.

The first cup is composed entirely of white wine, symbolizing the barrenness of the winter; the second is mostly white mixed with some red, symbolizing the approach of spring; the third is mostly red mixed with some white, symbolizing the progression of spring, and the fourth is all red, symbolizing the arrival of summer.

Fruit eaten during the seder is in four categories: fruit with a hard outer shell (almonds, pecans, walnuts), fruit with an inner pit (dates, olives, plums, cherries), fruit with an outer shell and inner pit (carob, avocado, pomegranate, orange) and fruit that is entirely edible (figs, grapes, raisins, strawberries). A large plate in the centre of the table is usually used to hold 15 different kinds of fruits, but sometimes individual plates are prepared for each person.

A woodcut from an early 18th-century book of customs in Amsterdam depicts a table laden with the fruits of Tu b'Shvat.

A friend of mine has always associated bokser, the fruit of the carob tree, with Tu b'Shvat, as he recalls his father bringing it home at holiday time. This tradition can be traced back to Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai, who, in the second century CE, took refuge in a cave with his son when hiding from the Romans, and lived on well water and the fruit of the carob tree for 13 years.

The late Lubavitcher Rebbe instructed his followers to eat carob on Tu b'Shvat during the Gulf War in 1991, because the talmudic sage Rabbi Chanina ben Dosa, who was know for his miraculous intervention on behalf of those in trouble, was known to eat carob. Although no miracles occurred, the war did take a turn for the better after the holiday.

One person usually leads the Tu b'Shvat seder – providing direction as to which fruit to eat or glass of wine to drink – and makes the appropriate blessing while holding in his hand the object being blessed. As with the Pesach seder, however, it is also quite acceptable for everyone to have a turn reading the Haggadah.

Noga Hareuven of Neot Kedumim, the Biblical Landscape Reserve in Israel, composed the following version of the questions used as part of their Tu b'Shvat seder program:

Why is the seder of the night of Tu b'Shvat different from the seder of the night of Passover?

Because at the Passover seder we eat matzah, and on this night, only fruit.

At the Passover seder, we drink wine of any colour; on this night, we drink white and red wine.

At the Passover seder, we tell of the Exodus from Egypt; on this night we speak of the fruits of the field.

Another seder begins by asking four ecologically relevant questions designed to help us understand the significance of this day:

Why does this holiday honour trees?

Why, today, do we eat fruit that is grown in Israel?

Why, today, do we focus on conservation?

Why do we think about planting, even though spring is still some way off?

In fact, environmentally conscious educators have suggested that the seder include the reciting of a list of makot (plagues) of the modern world, such as air pollution, water contamination, noise abuse, wanton destruction, causing the extinction of species, disregard for the environment (littering, using toxic materials, etc.) and not thinking of the future.

Tu b'Shvat Haggadot typically reaffirm our bond with the Land of Israel, rejoice in its rebirth and pledge to share in its rebuilding. One Tu b'Shvat Haggadah includes part of the first Israeli president Chaim Weizmann's emotion-packed speech when he opened the first Knesset of the State of Israel on Tu b'Shvat 1949: "Every Jew has a connection to Eretz Yisrael. We pray that the incoming of the exiles will bring in more and more people who will strike roots and work together with all of us to build the State of Israel and make the desolated land flower."

Consensus in Israel

Most analysts of the career of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon suggest he was a very poor strategist but a brilliant tactician. He knew how to respond to crises, but not how to avert them. He even precipitated some.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

What turned him into a great prime minister was his ability to read the mood of the majority of Israel's Jewish population. He may, in fact, have been a better follower than a leader. More than setting the country's agenda, he knew how to carry out the will of the people.

That will was manifest, first and foremost, in the determination that Israel be a Jewish state. Only a substantial Jewish majority could achieve that. If most of the citizens of Israel were Jews, Israel would be Jewish, irrespective of their religious and political views and irrespective of the criteria promulgated by the Orthodox rabbinate.

That is why Sharon decided to disengage from Gaza and thus remove 1.3 million Arabs from Israel's immediate orbit. Though the price of also having to move some 8,000 Jews may have weighed heavily on the man who for a long time was seen as the father of the settlement movement, Sharon believed that the price was worth paying.

Most Israelis are cautious about the left's insistence that accommodation with the Palestinians is within easy reach. The victory of Hamas in recent Palestinian legislative elections vindicates the caution. But even now, after the Hamas victory, Israelis are also unhappy with the seeming intransigence of the right. Sharon interpreted the mood of the majority to mean that unilateral separation was called for.

The Gaza pullout was probably conceived as the first of many similar steps. Whereas a cluster of Jewish settlements in the West Bank would be preserved, the areas where the majority of Palestinians lived would go back to them. The separation wall is being constructed with that in mind. The Hamas victory has made that even more urgent.

Kadima, the party Sharon formed, has gone beyond the conventional divisions of right and left. Opinion polls suggest that it may end up with a plurality in the March elections, even though Sharon is no longer at its helm. That's evidence enough that it's not the will of one man, however determined, but the will of the people, however seemingly divided, that will chart the course of Israel in the next few years.

The outpouring of affection and concern by friends and foes alike in response to Sharon's illness should perhaps be seen less as a tribute to a great leader than the warm appreciation of a man who was prepared to change his stance in order to carry out the wishes of the people.

Israel's national soccer squad: a good-news story

The recent Palestinian elections ended with a shocking result: Hamas won 76 of the 132 seats in the Palestinian assembly to become the official voice of the Palestinian people.

Hamas – regarded as a terrorist organization by the United States, Canada, the United Nations and the European Union – calls for the destruction of Israel. How could such a group win the election? I certainly don't have the answer to this question, but I've started my column with this suprising story in order to make a point.

When Israel makes the headlines, it's almost always because of politics or tragedy, such as the deterioration of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's health or the killing of an Israeli or Palestinian civilian who did not deserve to die.

Yet Israel deserves recognition not just because of the current political situation or because of terrible tragedies, but for its many heroic stories of human triumph, such as the achievements of its national soccer team.

Across the country, one in three Israelis watched on television last March as Abbas Suan, one of two Israeli Arabs on the national team, unleashed a blazing 22-yard shot that got past the Irish goalkeeper in the 90th minute to give Israel a 1-1 tie in a home game against Ireland. The goal kept alive what was undoubtedly the biggest underdog story of the road to soccer's 2006 World Cup in Germany.

Matthew Pattens in Halifax

After scoring his goal, Suan dropped to his knees, kissed the ground and thanked Allah. Then his teammates – all but one of them Jews – gang tackled him.

"The greatest moment of my life," is how Suan described his role in the team's comeback, which he celebrated by wrapping himself in Israel's Star of David flag.

Some 40,000 ecstatic Israelis turned the sold-out national stadium in Ramat Gan into one big blue-and-white party. And in Sakhnin, Suan's hometown, devout Muslims excitedly clogged the streets and shot fireworks into the sky. Among Israel's more liberal Jews and Hebrew-language media, the reaction was equally festive, as well as occasionally ironic – "Goyim equals goalim," read one headline.

For the first time in ages, Israeli Jews and Israeli Arabs shared the same sense of joy and accomplishment, all because of the Israeli soccer team's relentless perseverance.

Four nights later, again in Tel Aviv, an Arab again proved to be the team's saviour. This time, the team's other Muslim player, midfielder Walid Badir headed home the tying goal in the final minutes to earn a 1-1 draw against France, a perennial soccer powerhouse.

"We have Jewish players and we have Arab players, but they are all Israeli players," Itche Menachem, the president of the Israeli Soccer Federation, told Sports Illustrated last August.

"When there were no Arabs playing on the national team, they didn't pay attention. Now, in all the Arab communities of Israel, they watch the games, and they feel like they are part of it," Suan told the magazine.

Despite his heroics, Suan is subjected to threats, taunts and other forms of racism. Indeed, anti-Arab racism is so common at Israeli professional soccer games that the New Israel Fund – whose slogan is "Promoting equality and social justice for all Israelis" – monitors every professional match and issues a racism index each week to the media.

Israel's make-or-break qualifying game occurred in the St. Jakob Park stadium in Basel, Switzerland, the city where, in 1897, Theodor Herzl convened the first Zionist Congress, the body that proposed the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine.

The Israelis tied the Swiss team, coming just short of realizing the extraordinary dream of playing in the 2006 World Cup. The tie placed Switzerland ahead of Israel in the standings, pushing Israel into third place in group 4, in which only the top two teams advance.

Israel has not participated in a World Cup since 1970. Yet, the team that achieved the unthinkable – keeping pace with elite European national soccer teams while bringing together Arabs and Jews – offers a prime example of unity and accomplishment.

It's a story that should be told more often.

Moving beyond macaroni, oatmeal and hot dogs

I recently overheard an interesting conversation between two twentysomething students in the University of Manitoba's faculty of architecture.

Working late, as students often do, they were discussing the important things they had to do when they got home.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

Student 1: "Ugh. I can't wait to get home. This is the last time I forget to bring a lunch."

Student 2: "What's for dinner at home?"

Student 1: "Either hot dogs or macaroni and cheese."

Student 2: "Both nutritious and satisfying choices."

Student 1: "They also happen to be the only things I know how to make."

This seems a bit absurd to me. I'd say that after more than two decades on earth, a normal person should be able to do more when it comes to cooking than boil water. While it's important to know how to boil things (not to mention fun, as long as you avoid your own body parts), at a certain point in life, you should be capable of going beyond heating up H_2O.

If cooking a meal is too complex a task for you, what are you doing at university? How can we trust someone who can't assemble an omelet with the task of putting together a building? If you can't slice some vegetables for a salad or a stir fry, do we even want to think about you becoming a surgeon? If you're not able to follow a recipe with more than two ingredients or steps, should you be allowed to tackle more complex and dangerous things, such as operating a motor vehicle or changing a light bulb?

Now, I'm not saying that you can't survive by cooking with boiled water alone. Let's imagine for a moment the various meal possibilities: Breakfast could be instant oatmeal from a packet, which is chock full of fibre, so that's a positive. Lunch might be a bowl of instant ramen noodle soup – it's easy to prepare, but loaded with sodium, a definite minus. Supper might be hot dogs or macaroni and cheese. The next day might see cold macaroni and cheese for breakfast, oatmeal for lunch and hot dogs for supper.

But what if company is coming over? What tasty boiled treats could you whip up to delight their taste buds? As an appetizer, consider removing instant ramen soup from the cardboard cup it comes in and try serving it in a real bowl. Follow that up with a steaming macaroni-and-cheese, veggie-dog casserole as the main entrée, then cap the meal off with cinnamon-and-raisin flavoured oatmeal, lightly dusted with cinnamon or nutmeg and served in individual dessert dishes.

Yum, yum.

You could also try one of the simplest and oldest forms of cooking. It's mainly the domain of the male of the species, now modernized so that he sometimes wears an apron and holds some kind of metal flipping implement. About one trillion years ago (approximately), humans discovered fire. Not long after that, someone accidentally dropped a piece of meat into the fire, and it was later removed from the flames and eaten.

So began a sacred Sunday tradition. We have improved on it somewhat, but the basic idea of cooking things with fire is still around today. If cave men could do it – and, more importantly, if I can figure it out – anyone can get the hang of it.

One of the greatest discoveries of the 20th century, and the salvation of many a student who can do nothing but boil water, was the microwave oven. In 1947, the first commercial microwave stood almost six feet tall, weighed a hefty 750 pounds and cost approximately $7,000. Today, more microwaves are sold than conventional ovens, and hardly anyone worries about the potential health hazards from leaking radiation. We're also all aware of the potential carcinogenic effects of nuking something in styrofoam or plastic, thanks to numerous forwarded e-mails from concerned friends. Plus, a good microwave can be had for under $100, a very important factor for students, not to mention parents who are sending their offspring out into the real world of meal preparation.

Yes, the microwave has revolutionized food preparation and freed up many minutes in the busy life of a university student. You can boil water in less than one minute in a microwave, so now you can pull an all-nighter studying for exams and still have a hot nutritious breakfast of instant oatmeal, and then nuke hot dogs for company at dinnertime.

Hamas victory raises two major questions

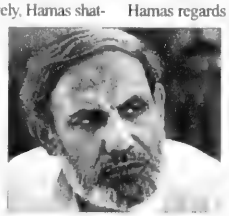
As Israelis and Arabs take stock of Hamas' stunning victory in the Palestinian parliamentary election in the West Bank and Gaza Strip on Jan. 25, two salient questions are worth pondering. The first is whether Hamas is capable of moderating its steadfast rejectionist policies and thus redefining itself. The second turns on whether Hamas will observe the shaky, unwritten truce with Israel, which officially expired at the end of 2005.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The answers to these questions may well affect the Arab-Israeli peace process, such as it is, and stability in the Middle East.

In an astonishing break with the status quo, Hamas – which boycotted the last general election in the Palestinian Authority in 1996 – won 76 out of 132 seats in the Legislative Council, thus becoming the first Islamic party to win an election in the Arab world. Fatah, the ruling secular nationalist party co-founded by Yasser Arafat in the mid-1950s, picked up only 43 seats. Fringe parties won the remaining mandates.

Pundits assumed that Fatah would defeat Hamas by a narrow margin and form a coalition government with its Islamic rival. Nobody, including Hamas officials, expected Hamas to score such a triumph. By winning so decisively, Hamas shattered Fatah's domination of Palestinian politics, added a new layer of complexity to the Arab-Israeli dispute, practically ensured that Israel will take further unilateral steps to delineate its final borders and proved that the exercise of democracy in the Middle East can unleash negative forces.



Mahmoud Zahar

Hamas, which campaigned under the banner of "Change and Reform," triumphed because Fatah was generally seen as a corrupt and inefficient party unable to stem lawlessness, deliver basic services, build a sound economy and forge peace with Israel. Previously, the majority of these factors enabled Hamas to acquit itself quite well in municipal elections. Hamas won one-third of the seats in the West Bank and nearly two-thirds in Gaza, which Israel evacuated last summer.

Considering that it was founded only 19 years ago, during the opening days of the first Palestinian uprising, Hamas has progressed rapidly. Ironically, it owes part of its success to Israel, which initially backed Hamas as a counterweight to the PLO. An offshoot of Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, Hamas is militantly anti-Israel. Its 1988 charter, the work of the late Ahmed Yassin and his closest associates, leaves no doubts about its philosophy and intentions. The charter, which draws inspiration from the anti-Semitic Protocols of the Elders of Zion, describes Palestine as a Muslim endowment that cannot be ceded to non-Muslims, or infidels. Calling for Israel's elimination and describing Jews as intrinsically evil, the charter is more extreme than the PLO's first national covenant. "We do not recognize the Israeli enemy, nor his right to be our neighbour, nor to stay, or his ownership of any inch of land," Mahmoud Zahar, a top Hamas leader in Gaza, declared recently.

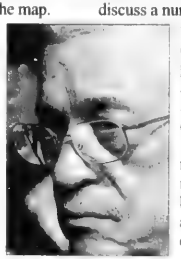
Like Islamic Jihad, which boycotted last month's PA election, Hamas hews to an uncompromising worldview that puts it sharply at odds with the PA's current president, Mahmoud Abbas, who is committed to peace negotiations with Israel, the yet-to-be-implemented 2003 "road map" peace plan and a two-state solution.

Hamas and Abbas also differ on the use of violence. Abbas has denounced the intifadah, saying it is inimical to Palestinian interests. By contrast, Hamas regards it as an absolute necessity. Since the outbreak of the second intifadah in September 2000, Hamas, by its own admission, has carried out 54 per cent of the more than 400 suicide attacks in Israel and the territories. Islamic Jihad, which has carried out all six suicide bombings since the start of the informal ceasefire last February, including the latest one in Tel Aviv on Jan. 19, has been responsible for almost 40 such attacks. The Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, which is loosely affiliated with Fatah, has perpetrated about 22 bombings.

Given its blood-stained record, Hamas has come under intense pressure from the United States, the European Union, Russia, the United Nations' secretary general, Egypt and Canada to recognize Israel, renounce violence, disarm and honour previous PA agreements with Israel.

Hamas risks losing about $1 billion (US) in annual aid if it snubs its nose at these conditions. Without these funds, the virtually bankrupt PA would find itself in still more dire straits. But Hamas does not appear to care about the consequences of its obduracy. Last week, Osama Hamdan, a senior Hamas official, said that Hamas will not give in to "blackmail" and will seek funds elsewhere, presumably in Iran, whose president has called for Israel to be wiped off the map.

Israel's acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, who is filling in for the hospitalized Ariel Sharon, has also projected toughness. Having pledged not to deal with Hamas unless it transforms itself, Olmert is withholding tax rebates and customs revenues that the PA is entitled to until the situation becomes much clearer.



Mahmoud Abbas

Facing catastrophic economic sanctions and a disastrous loss of political support for the Palestinian cause, Hamas leaders remain defiant, at least for now.

Zahar, one of the founders of Hamas, stated last week that recognition of Israel is a non-starter. But he said that he would be willing to consider a long-term truce under certain conditions. In passing, he denigrated the idea of peace talks with Israel, saying that the Palestinians had gained nothing from the Oslo process, which Hamas rejected vehemently from the outset. Incredibly enough, Zahar also demanded that Israel should remove the two blue bands from its flag, claiming that they symbolize Israel's secret desire to expand its borders from the Euphrates to the Nile.

His colleague, Moussa Abu Marzouk, the deputy head of Hamas, sounded a similar theme: "As long as there is occupation and so long as our people's rights are usurped, our stand will remain the same." Khaled Meshal, the most important Hamas leader in exile and the target of an abortive Israeli assassination attempt in Amman in September 1997, said that Hamas would not "submit to pressure" and defended attacks on Israeli civilians.

On the face of it, these statements strongly suggest that Hamas will not abandon ideological rigour in exchange for international legitimacy. Hamas, right now, is where the PLO was situated a generation ago, placing emphasis on "armed struggle" rather than peaceful coexistence with Israel. It took the PLO approximately 30 years to recognize Israel. Hamas, which is more radical than the PLO ever was, will need a lot more coaxing to reform itself. It seems clear that the clock has been turned back now that Hamas has become the Palestinians' face to the world.

But there is a silver lining in the dark clouds. Judging by its statements and actions on the ground, Hamas is fully capable of adopting pragmatic positions. Last December, Hamas officials in the West Bank town of Qalqilya met with representatives of the Israel Electricity Company to discuss a number of practical issues. In its election campaign manifesto, Hamas dropped its call for Israel to be replaced by an Islamic state from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea – not because Hamas had suddenly recognized Israel but because Israel was not considered a pressing matter at this point in time. For Hamas, the real issue was reform and better government. Most Palestinians, who favour a two-state solution, embraced the message.

But since Hamas is composed of different factions, it also doles out contradictory messages. Two days before the election, Hamas raised the possibility of negotiating with Israel through a third party, probably the PLO, but earlier, Hamas ruled out such talks. All rhetoric aside, Hamas seems ready for an extended truce with Israel, provided Israel withdraws to the pre-1967 lines, releases all Palestinian prisoners, allows Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes and ceases military operations against its fighters. Israel, which is intent on retaining major settlement blocs in the West Bank and keeping out the bulk of the refugees, will resist virtually all these demands. So a stalemate looms.

Hamas leaders exiled in Syria and Lebanon oppose the current ceasefire, or tahdia, which in any case has been repeatedly broken by both sides. But the Hamas leadership in the West Bank and Gaza wants to preserve the truce in the "national interest," as Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh has indicated.

In principle, however, Hamas remains wedded to violence to advance its objective of establishing an Islamic state in place of Israel. Hamas, which engaged in heavy clashes with the Israeli army last September, has been trying to transfer Qassam rockets from Gaza to the West Bank. If Hamas succeeds, Israeli cities on the coastal plain and Ben-Gurion Airport will be in its crosshairs.

Hamas may yet evolve into a responsible organization prepared to coexist with Israel. But years may elapse before Hamas comes to its senses and faces reality. In the meantime, Hamas is wholeheartedly dedicated to Israel's destruction.

Jewish Life

The Crypto-Jews of New Mexico

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

It has been only about two decades since tales began surfacing in the popular press of Hispanic-Catholic families in the American Southwest who lit candles in secret on Friday evenings and retained other long-held family customs bearing unmistakable resemblance to Jewish rites.

Some families abstained from work or travel on Saturday, circumcised newborn boys, drained the blood from their meat, and avoided pork. Some related finding strange capsules containing Hebrew parchments on doorposts in their grandparents' homes, while some noticed Jewish stars and candelabras engraved on family tombstones alongside Christian crosses. Children asking their elders about such mysteries were told, "Eramos Judios" ("We were Jews").

As historian Stanley M. Hordes documents in a new book, To the End of the Earth: A History of the Crypto-Jews of New Mexico (Columbia University Press), an untold number of crypto-Jews have lived for centuries in an unlikely diaspora scattered across New Mexico and the American Southwest. They generally had no significant involvement with the Ashkenazi Jewish immigrants who arrived in the region after it became part of the United States in 1848.

As Hordes explains, these hidden Jews were descended from Sephardi Jews who fled Spain more than 500 years ago and, travelling via Portugal, Holland and the Canary Islands, first reached New Spain in the late 1500s. Because the Portuguese Inquisition then raged as fiercely as a forest fire, whole communities of conversos or crypto-Jews were forced to uproot themselves overnight.

In escaping persecution, some rushed after new mercantile opportunities in the Spanish territories of the New World. Many would have landed at Veracruz on the Gulf of Mexico, then journeyed to Mexico City, the hub of a rugged new empire in which they were to become adventurers, merchants and explorers.

The Catholic world's anti-Semitic fervour soon infected the Mexican territories, however, and hundreds of suspected "judaicizers" were arrested in Mexico City. It is a fact little remembered today that some 400 years ago, Mexico burned an untold number of crypto-Jews at the stake.

Through extensive archival research, Hordes demonstrates that many Judaic immigrants pushed northward via the Rio Grande into New Mexico, the very fringes of New Spain, where practitioners of "la ley muerta de Moises" – the forbidden "dead law of Moses" – could breathe more freely.

To the End of the Earth presents a scholarly history of the origins of New Mexico's crypto-Jews, with detailed portraits of prominent figures such as Juan de Onate (1550-1626), the first European explorer of the upper Rio Grande valley, who protected many crypto-Jews among his exploration party and may have hidden a parallel ancestry.

The most extensively researched book on the subject to date, To the End of the Earth also offers a compelling sociological study of New Mexico's conversos in the contemporary period. If Hordes's history is sometimes dry, his descriptions of present-day descendants of crypto-Jews and their practices are enticingly readable.

Why is this history emerging only now? As Hordes notes, descendants of the original crypto-Jews, having lost much of their ancestral heritage, are finally coming out into the open with their questions. In many families, he writes, "specific knowledge of their Jewish heritage ceased being transmitted in the mid-20th century."

But that's hardly the end of the story. According to a recent article in the New York Times, numerous Hispanic Catholics in New Mexico, Colorado and Texas have converted to Judaism in recent years after discovering their ancestral Jewish roots.

"I feel like I came home," said one convert, Bernadette Gonzalez, who now calls herself Batya. "The fingerprints of my past were all around me, but I didn't know what they meant."

Oh, those exotic Moroccans!

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the first Moroccan immigrants' arrival in Canada. This column is part of a series.

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

In the last century, the vast majority of North African Jews lived in cities, their homes complete with indoor plumbing and electricity. They dressed themselves in western attire and related well to contemporary European norms. They were fluent in at least one other language beyond Arabic, and depending on the locale, this other tongue could be French, Spanish, Italian or even English.

At the same time, there were rural and mountain communities of Jews whose lifestyles remained untouched and unchanged by time. Aside from their faith as Jews, their dwellings, dress, and deportment blended seamlessly with that of their Muslim neighbours.

In the 1940s and '50s, these Jews were the first to emigrate. For them, the journey to Zion was no less than a messianic realization. In a matter of days, these Jews would travel quite a distance – not just a few thousand kilometres to the Promised Land, but also a few thousand years forward into the modern world.

Comical stories of their adjustment, or maladjustment, abound. Pyjamas were happily worn as street clothes. Inappropriate use was made of the toilet and its water. One family hung chairs on the walls, and when asked why, they said that's how they had seen them displayed in stores! While some of these stories may have been embellished, there is no denying their essence.

The experience of the Jews who immigrated to North America and Europe was wholly different. By and large, they were urban, educated, multilingual and well-travelled. Nonetheless, earlier stories of the Israeli experience in the '40s and '50s would haunt them. "Just how civilized could an African immigrant be?" was the thinking of the day.

One had to politely endure a litany of demeaning questions. Did you live in huts? Did you wear regular clothing? Did you use plates, forks and knives? Did people bathe? Etcetera, etcetera.

One typical immigrant found himself in just such a situation. His boss was an otherwise open-minded, enlightened and kind fellow Jew. He was, however, incessantly intrigued about life in Morocco and never shy to ask questions, particularly about the level of civility, hygiene, education, organization and religiosity.

The immigrant, tired of assuring his boss that his life in Morocco was neither exotic nor primitive, decided to show him first-hand things were like. He did this by inviting him and his wife to his home for a traditional Shabbat meal. Caught by surprise and not knowing what to expect, the boss hesitantly accepted the invitation.

The evening, a traditional one with elegant candles lighting the Shabbat dinner, left the good boss and his wife wide-eyed. In honour of the occasion, the table was set with the finest linen, crystal, china and silver, and the floors were covered with brilliant, hand-knotted Moroccan rugs. A multi-course meal was served – perhaps there was too much food, and it was certainly much too spicy, but it was very tasteful.

"No" was the unspoken word, as in, "No painted natives dancing wildly around a cauldron on an open fire." Here was a normal Jewish family, basking in the warmth of Shabbat.

Shakespeare still interests us today

Shakespeare: The Biography by Peter Ackroyd, Random House.
The Age of Shakespeare by Frank Kermode, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Shakespeare, who was named Man of the Millennium by British BBC listeners a few years ago and has been at the top of many lists of the most influential people of modern times, wasn't always as popular as he is today. His friend and rival dramatist, Ben Jonson, remarked that he wished Shakespeare had "blotted" a thousand lines from his plays.

When Samuel Pepys (1633-1703) attended a Shakespearian drama, he wasn't impressed. Of Romeo and Juliet he said: "A play of itself the worst I have ever heard." He also referred to A Midsummer Night's Dream as "the most insipid, ridiculous play I have ever seen in my life."

Through the centuries, negative criticism of the plays alternated with unstinted praise. Leo Tolstoy was determined to cure the world of its "insane delusion, its collective hallucination" about Shakespeare. But, the formidable modern scholar Harold Bloom is of the opinion that Shakespeare not only reinvented the English language but also created human nature as we know it today. He writes, "The answer to the question 'Why Shakespeare?' must be 'Who else is there?'"

In recent years, there have been at least six major Shakespeare biographies published. Understandably, they overlap, but each contributes keen insights, creative speculation and bits of new information.

This is true of Peter Ackroyd's 500-page volume that tackles all facets of the poet's life against the richly textured background of his time. In 90 relatively brief subsections, the omnivorous author covers all that the general reader would want to know about Shakespeare's world and his genius.

In his new work, Frank Kermode, a distinguished British scholar of 16th- and 17th-century literature, takes the reader on a tour of Shakespeare's England. He vividly paints a picture of London society: religious beliefs, burgeoning population, epidemics, socio-economic conditions, the state of the arts and the rivalry of competing theatres.

Referring to the Merchant of Venice, the author reminds us that the character of Shylock has provoked so many interpretations that he has turned into the wandering Jew. He didn't become the conventional caricature depicted in the folklore of the time.

"He was altogether too powerful and perplexing a figure… Shakespeare simply could not write a stereotype. Perhaps, like so many of his principle figures, he is beyond interpretation… unlike some of his fellow dramatists, Shakespeare's Shylock is infinitely more interesting and sympathetic than the stock type. As a result, Shylock has entered the imagination of the world."

The author writes: "I shall try in what follows to keep in mind that just as his was only the grandest of the companies, Shakespeare was only the grandest of the poets writing for the many and under one aspect, a very successful businessman, a type that was common at the time in other professions; but he was also a poet who had certain aristocratic contacts and – as a liveried servant of the Crown, a minor courtier—a man acquainted with much that went on in social ranks both above and below him."

Both of these books provide masterly treatment of the individual plays, deftly interwoven with the flow of colourful narrative. Popular in style, these latest additions to the unceasing Shakespearian canon will be warmly welcomed.

Israel and the Winter Olympics

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When you picture Israelis facing off against elite international athletes, you might think of them competing in sports like basketball or windsurfing. But how about ice dancing or downhill skiing? That's what they'll be doing when the world's finest meet this month at the 20th Olympic Winter Games in Torino, Italy.

Although this is the fourth Israeli delegation to the winter games, they must be used to being overshadowed by their high-profile summer counterparts. The Israeli Olympic Committee's English web page barely mentions winter sports. [http://olympic.tapuz.co.il/English.asp] At least in Hebrew you will learn that Israel first sent a winter delegation to the 1994 Lillehammer Games in Norway, where skater Michael Shmerkin finished a respectable 16th. At Nagano, Japan, in 1998, Shmerkin was joined by Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovski. At the 2002 Games in Salt Lake City, the Israeli contingent grew to five when Israel first competed in short-track speedskating with Olga Danilov placing 14th. [http://olympic.tapuz.co.il/Torino.asp]

This year, five athletes will represent Israel in Torino – including a return to the Olympics by Chait and Saknovsky. When the pair won bronze at the 2002 Games in Nagano, it marked the country's first medal at the Worlds. Kerry Meier has put together a fansite that documents the skaters' career. [www.mieze katze.net/cs]

This year, Israel will be represented by an alpine skier for the first time at the Olympics. You can see a shot of Ukrainian oleh Mikhail Renzin in action, as well as other members of Israel's team at this photo gallery. [http://tinyurl.com/8sn5r]

Although it was not yet reflected at the official Olympic site, Ha'aretz reports that two other Israeli competitors will also be off to Turin. In January, ice dancers Roman and Alexandra Zaretsky finished 15th at the European championship in Lyon, France, and made the cut for Torino. Roman, 22, and his sister, Alexandra, 18, were born in Minsk, Belarus, and immigrated to Israel in 1992. Their parents are both skating coaches at Metulla's Canada Centre, Israel's only Olympic-sized skating rink. [http://tinyurl.com/exq4f]

The decision to send the Zaretskys to the Olympics has been a controversial one. Although the International Olympic Committee had already granted them a spot in Torino, Israel's Olympic Committee would not give its approval unless they did well in Lyon. Boris Chait, chairman of the Israel Ice Skating Federation (and Galit's father) told the Jerusalem Post that Israel should not have waited to give the Zaretskys the green light. Keeping them from Torino would have been "a disaster in the making for the Winter Olympic program in Israel," Chait said before Lyon. "It takes generations to develop world-class athletes in winter sports… Israel doesn't have a surplus of world-class athletes." [http://tinyurl.com/9bbl7]

You can learn more about the Zaretskys at their official website. [www.ice-dance.com/zaretsky/] During the Olympics, check out coverage at the Jerusalem Post [www.jpost.com] and Ha'aretz [www.haaretz.com] as well as the Hebrew-language Olympics discussion forum at Tapuz. [http://forums.tapuz.co.il/olympics]

And finally, there is Israel's "Frozen Chosen." Reminiscent of the Jamaican bobsled team that caused a stir at the 1988 Calgary Olympics, it turns out that Israel actually has its own bobsled hopefuls. Sort off. Although the team has already participated in two world championships, the Frozen Chosen couldn't get support from Israel's Olympic Committee. [http://tinyurl.com/88as5] Writing at Ynetnews, Alan Abbey defends the North American-based team from criticism that it is not Israeli enough. Abbey says the team is undaunted and hopes to compete in 2010 in Vancouver. [http://tinyurl.com/7kmjn]

Realistically, none of the Israeli athletes to Torino is expected to come home with gold (or silver or bronze.) That may take a bit of time. After all, it took 40 years of competition until Israel won silver and bronze at the 1992 Summer Games in Barcelona. And it wasn't until 2004 in Athens that Hatikvah was played as an emotional Gal Fridman was awarded gold for his incredible achievement in windsurfing. [http://tinyurl.com/9legv]

Hopefully, it won't take Israel's winter elite quite as long.

IsraelFEST a city-wide success across the GTA

Hillel hosts annual celebration of Israel

By YONI GOLDSTEIN
UJA Federation

A non-political celebration of Israeli culture and diversity took over the campuses of Toronto universities recently as IsraelFest, an annual celebration of all things Israeli sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto, showed participants what Israel is really all about. IsraelFEST celebrations were held at the University of Toronto, York University and Ryerson University.

An estimated 700 students took in the festivities at York University which included a guest lecture by Yossi Vassa, an Israeli-Ethiopian actor; an Israeli-style breakfast and an Israeli-themed Shabbat dinner at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

"The Israel experience doesn't end when you leave Israel," says Elise Loterman, Hillel's Arts and Culture chairperson and IsraelFEST chair at York. "We wanted to show Jewish students that there are many ways to celebrate everything Israeli even when you aren't there. IsraelFest shows that Canadians and Israelis share the same values and that they have much in common. IsraelFest shows that the Middle East isn't all about bombs, Hamas, terror and tension. People need to see Israel for what it really is, a country so full of life and culture."

At Ryerson University, IsraelFEST enjoyed the participation of both Jewish and non-Jewish students. The weekly "bagel lunch" sponsored by Ryerson Hillel was transformed into an Israeli-style "pita party" and Hillel also sponsored a one-day seminar that focused on the many cultures found in Israel. As well, Hillel organized a Middle Eastern Food Festival, a joint-program with the Ryerson Iranian Student Association, celebrating the food and culture of the two countries. "The Food Festival was definitely the great success story of IsraelFEST at Ryerson," explains Ryerson at Hillel president Jonathan Vandersluis. "It gave us the opportunity to show that Israel and the Middle East are about so much more than politics."

The University of Toronto's IsraelFEST activities attracted another 700 participants over the course of the week. The festivities included an "Israeli Culture Café" in the university's Medical Science building, during which students were encouraged to participate in a silk screen mural painting of the building's walls. The "Israel Culture Café" also featured a falafel stand that attracted many passers-by to a taste they had never tried before. "This type of programming is so important on campus," says Laura Herman, co-chair of IsraelFEST at the University of Toronto. "As Jewish students it is essential that we demonstrate our pride in Israeli culture and celebrate the great developments that the country has made."

The city-wide event was made possible by contributions from UJA Federation, which financially supports Hillel.

Jewish Federations play key role in rebuilding after tsunami

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Just over a year after one of the worst natural disasters ever, the people of Southeast Asia continue to rebound and start their lives over again thanks, in large part, to the efforts of the Jewish Federations of North America.

On December 26, 2005 an underwater earthquake and tsunami devastated this area, killing more than 230,000 people and forcing five million to restart their lives in poverty and despair. The hardest hit areas were Indonesia, Sri Lanka, Thailand and India.

Immediately following the devastation, UJA Federation – in cooperation with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), the overseas arm of the North American Jewish community - created its Tsunami Relief Fund, which went on to raise more than $1.4 million – including almost $900,000 in cash. In all, close to $19 million was raised through JDC and its Federation partners to carry out disaster relief and longer-term development programs in the most severely damaged countries.

"The Jewish community of Toronto was one that stepped up to the plate in a very notable way," says JDC spokesman, Joshua Berkman. "Toronto's generosity has enabled, among other things a new village to rise from a refugee camp in Indonesia, the building of 185 modern playgrounds in Sri Lanka, and the establishment of an innovative psychological counseling program in Thailand."

Some funds raised by UJA Federation's Tsunami Relief Fund went to build new playgrounds in Sri Lanka.

In India, JDC partnered with the Disaster Mitigation Institute (DMI) to provide emergency supplies and build multiple-family dwellings. Funds raised also provided thousands of families with food and furnished children with school bags and supplies so that they could resume their studies.

"The scope of this disaster is so great that JDC determined early on that the money we raised from Jews in North America would have the greatest impact if we did not spread ourselves thin, but instead identified and supported specific projects being undertaken by partner NGOs," says Berkman. "These partnerships have allowed us to improve people's lives in a significant and permanent way."

"The fact that we share the expertise learned through our Jewish programs to produce positive change in the larger society adds a dimension that we do not often highlight, but one of which we are truly proud," says Steve Schwager, JDC executive vice president.

Adult March of the Living explores Polish consciousness

Participants are preparing to embark on the 2006 edition of the March of the Living (MOL), and it isn't only high-schoolers who are packing their bags. The Adult March of the Living is readying its own two-week trip, spanning the old Jewish communities and Nazi concentration camps of Poland, followed by a week-long celebration of Jewish life in Israel.

The 14-day trip, which leaves for Krakow on April 23 and returns to Toronto on May 7, is an international initiative sponsored in Toronto by UJA Federation. But while the Adult March does share many trademarks of the popular teenage trip – including participation with more than 10,000 people from all over the world in the three kilometre march to the concentration camps of Auschwitz-Birkenau on April 27 – the itinerary has a different, more mature focus than the main March of the Living.

"Most of the young people who come on the March are in Poland to discover the roots of their grandparents or great-grandparents," explains Shirley Worth, organizer of the Adult MOL. "But for the adults, we hope to help them find a deeper connection."

Participants on last year's UJA Federation Adult March of the Living at the Auschwitz train station as they prepared for their march to Birkenau.

For that reason, this year's Adult March of the Living focuses more strongly on exploring the Polish consciousness both before and after the Holocaust, and the revival of Jewish life in the country. "During Communist rule and in its aftermath, nobody in Europe was ready to deal with their part in the Holocaust," Worth explains. "The people of Eastern Europe are only now starting to be able to deal with the pre-war histories of the Jewish people in their countries."

The Adult March includes visits to Poland's Jewish Historical Society and a walking tour of Warsaw – beyond the Warsaw Ghetto – along with tours of Jewish cemeteries and a number of concentration camps.

The trip was a life-changing experience for Freema Trager, who, along with her husband Joe, chaired the Toronto contingent to the Adult March of the Living last year. "The adult trip is a much more serious one," she explains. "It really puts the survivor mentality into context." Trager estimates that 75 per cent of the Toronto travelers came from families of survivors. "Everyone on the bus had a personal story that drove them to go back to Poland. They were all there to discover their roots and try to capture a sense of what life was like for their parents and loved ones."

For Freema everything came into focus during the group's tour of Auschwitz-Birkenau. "We were standing in one of the camp's gas chambers," she relates, "and a man – who wasn't even on our trip – took out a prayer book and started to read Kaddish out loud while standing on the tracks that brought Jews to their deaths and facing the open ovens."

The Adult March culminates with a celebration in Jerusalem of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israeli Independence Day, taking MOL participants from a low time in our Jewish existence to one of our happiest and proudest accomplishments.

Percentage of students enrolling in Jewish schools increasing

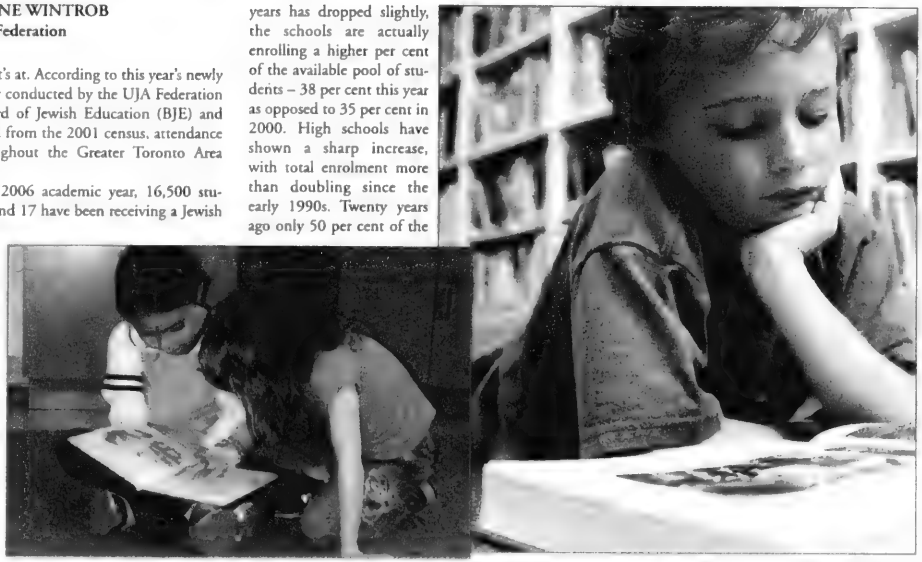
Increase despite fewer Jewish children being born than in the past

By SUZANNE WINTROB
UJA Federation

Jewish education is where it's at. According to this year's newly released population survey conducted by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and based on information obtained from the 2001 census, attendance at Jewish high schools throughout the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) continues to rise.

During the current 2005/2006 academic year, 16,500 students between the ages of six and 17 have been receiving a Jewish education, representing more than half of all Jewish school-aged children living in the GTA. Sixty-one per cent of six to 13 year olds are attending Jewish day or supplementary schools, as are 33 per cent of 14 to 17 year olds.

Canadian census data shows that far fewer Jewish children are being born than in the recent past, but the percentage of Jewish students enrolling in Jewish schools is increasing. Although the total number of students enrolled in Grades 1 – 8 over the past five years has dropped slightly, the schools are actually enrolling a higher per cent of the available pool of students – 38 per cent this year as opposed to 35 per cent in 2000. High schools have shown a sharp increase, with total enrolment more than doubling since the early 1990s. Twenty years ago only 50 per cent of the students coming on board in Grade 1 went on to a Jewish high school, but now 78 per cent of them are doing so.



Twenty years ago only half of the students who began in Grade 1 went on to a Jewish high school. Today 78 per cent are doing so.

"Parents are recognizing the importance of Jewish education for their children and, in turn, we're working closely with our Jewish school teachers and administrators to develop quality materials and innovative programming that they can introduce into the curriculum," says BJE chair Baila Lubek. "We're pleased that the schools are reaching more than 50 per cent of the Jewish children, but we are not resting on our laurels. We would like to reach many more Jewish children, through formal or informal educational programs."

More than 40 per cent of all elementary school students attending day schools live north of Steeles. The construction of Vaughan's new 50-acre Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus at Bathurst and Weldrick will help to meet their needs, says Lubek.

The new campus, an initiative of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, will include branches of United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS), Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and, hopefully, other schools to follow. CHAT is set to open in time for the 2007 school year and the Lebovic Campus branch of USDS is scheduled for completion in 2008.

One of these York Region students is Kyle Borenstein, a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and now a Grade 12 student at CHAT's current Richmond Hill Campus. He says if it weren't for Jewish day school, he may never have learned Jewish law, Jewish history or Hebrew language.

"In today's society, being able to have the time to formally teach Jewish children on our own is very difficult," says Borenstein, 17, who plans to attend Yeshiva in Israel next year. "Growing up in a Jewish educational system has allowed me to learn all these different areas of Jewish studies from qualified teachers, including teachers who have come from Israel not only to educate me but to also give me an Israeli experience. I now have all the basic tools I need in order to move on to the next phase of my life and to continue to live a Jewish life. When I get to Yeshiva next year, I won't have to start at square one. I'll be able to continue from where I am now."

Marlon Danilewitz agrees. The 18-year-old attended Bialik Hebrew Day School before heading to CHAT Richmond Hill and has spent much of his day school experience involved in athletics, peer counseling, student council, and anything else he could get his hands on. He believes having a Jewish education has set him up for life.

"It all flows from my identity," says Danilewitz, also from York Region. "I am Jewish first, a mensch second, and then the loyalty to whatever country I reside in. I am considering pursuing my Jewish education further in Israel for a year. However, I know without a doubt that when I enter the university world I will be a Jewish leader and supporter of Israel."

UJA Federation establishes Netzarim Fund

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Following this summer's heart-wrenching disengagement of close to 10,000 Jews from their homes in Gaza and the northern Shomron region, the former residents continue to face the painful and arduous process of starting their lives over again.

To help them rebuild their lives and get them back on their feet, UJA Federation - in cooperation with The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner, and the Government of Israel - has created the Netzarim Fund, which is raising money, supplementary to the UJA Federation annual campaign, to assist with the creation of new communities for Jewish life in the Negev area.

The UJA Federation Netzarim Fund was created to raise funds for new Jewish communities in the Negev.

A delegation from these groups held a series of parlour meetings in Toronto recently to explain the current situation and their future plans.

Spearheaded by Toronto philanthropist Kurt Rothschild, the concept of the fund was brought to UJA Federation president Ted Sokolsky after some donors, expressing concern for the fate of the former Gaza residents, came to Rothschild with large donations.

"I went to Ted and suggested to him that I would like these donations to go through UJA Federation," said Rothschild. "We must do whatever we can to help these people who are facing such hardships. The residents of Gush Katif alone contributed so much to the development of Israel, including $150 million a year in exports from the 21 settlements they built there. Now, we must give back to them."

"Coincidentally, many donors had already come to us before Kurt approached me, for similar reasons," said Sokolsky. "Because of our strong affinity to the building and flourishing of the Negev and our desire to assist in true nation building – and knowing that JAFI was deeply involved in the project – this was something that UJA Federation was glad to coordinate."

Money raised by the Netzarim Fund will go to augment allocations being provided by the Government of Israel.

"The government funds are going to infrastructure projects in the area such as permanent housing, new roads, electricity and water," said Rothschild. "Funds we raise will go to the other important social, recreational and educational needs such as playgrounds, kindergartens and schools."

"The fact that members of Toronto's Jewish community are donating so generously to the Netzarim Fund – above and beyond their annual UJA Federation gifts – is yet another testament to their compassion," said David Engel, chair of the UJA Federation Board.

Security barrier called Sharon's greatest legacy

By KYLE GORDON
CJN Intern

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's role in creating the Israeli security barrier had moral and political implications for the Israeli and Palestinian people, says Isabel Kershner, author of Barrier: The Seam of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict.

"Sharon set in motion the beginning of the partition that defines where Israel begins and ends," but he did not actually want it. Sharon preferred offence to defence, Kershner told the audience at Holy Blossom Temple recently.

In September 2000, exactly as the intifadah was breaking out, Uzi Dayan was appointed to head the National Security Council. It was Dayan who felt that a fence that could delineate responsibility for who controls what and where was necessary, said Kershner, an associate editor of The Jerusalem Report who moved to Israel in 1990.

"Under the mounting pressure in the spring of 2002, Sharon approved the fence project," she said. At the time, 80 per cent of Israelis saw the wall as an answer to the bombings.

To illustrate the effect of the security barrier on the Israeli people, Kershner mentioned the West Bank Jewish settlement of Alfei Menashe, located near the Green Line, Israel's pre-1967 border.

According to the initial barrier map, Alfei Menashe was going to be on the Palestinian side of the wall.

Hisdai Eliezer, the mayor of Alfei Menashe, felt that this was the beginning of the end for his little "quality of life" settlement, Kershner said.

"Eliezer stalked Dayan… It worked," she said.

After two weeks, Sharon arrived and surveyed the scene. He agreed that the wall could not leave the settlement out. They redrew the line and Alfei Menashe was in.

Although the Israelis were victorious, the amendments to the map subsequently forced five tiny Palestinian villages to become trapped in the barrier that forms the Alfei Menashe enclave.

"Villages don't know if they have won or lost. It just shows that the fence route is really a hodgepodge," Kershner said.

Despite the problems surrounding the building of the barrier, terror in Israel's northern section has dropped 90 per cent in the first year. "We have unarguably seen a reduction in violence," she said.

"I want to stress, for Israelis, this barrier is a last resort. No one wants to spend billions of shekels. But it is still a winning concept and it gives Israelis a sense of security," she added.

"If anything, Sharon left Israel with a strength it never had. This barrier is Sharon's greatest legacy," Kershner said.

She noted that Israel is "living through rapid change."

When Sharon established the Kadima party in November 2005, "suddenly we had a third party that provided a way forward," she said.

Once Sharon fell ill, people wondered if the party would continue. "I left a country… that was self-assured. Israelis are rallying around Kadima and the acting prime minister," she said.

Alienation spurred modern Jewish politics: scholar

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In the late 19th century, young Jewish men who had left their small-town communities for big cities in eastern Europe felt alienated and depressed, which led them into Jewish politics, an Israeli academic says.

Scott Ury, a Jewish studies scholar at Hebrew University, gave a talk at the University of Toronto last month titled Communities and Crisis: The turn to Jewish Politics in Modern Eastern Europe. His presentation was this year's Ray D. Wolfe Memorial Lecture, sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News Fund in honour of the paper's former president.

Ury, the 2005-06 Ray D. Wolfe doctoral fellow at Hebrew U, where he is completing his dissertation on eastern European Jewry, discussed the transformation of Jewish society in late 19th century.

"While alienation and the larger sense of hopelessness and helplessness were motifs of 19th century European society, they were also integral parts of Jewish society and culture at the time," he said.

"What haskalah [Jewish Enlightenment]-inspired ideology, informal circles of friends, and traditional association could not deliver, modern politics, both Jewish and non-Jewish, was often able to provide."

Ury bases his theory on letters written by young Jewish men who lived in the late 1800's.

David Green, who later became to be known as Israeli Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion, and Yosef Hayyim Brenner, an author and socialist, were examples of young men who moved from small European towns to big cities, and they chronicled their difficulties in adjusting to urban life in their letters.

"While many Jewish migrants were able to find temporary solace in friendship circles and other support groups… these networks of predominantly male friends ultimately failed to resolve the larger underlying issues that plagued this generation," Ury said.

The friendship circles were not enough to quell a sense of loneliness, despair and alienation brought on by migration and urbanization, he said.

The hopelessness they felt led them to seek work that would bring meaning to "their otherwise superfluous lives."

Theoretically, the search for friendship, community and belonging could have alleviated the effects of modernity, Ury said, but "work in which they could invest their entire souls, work that would make them forget their down-trodden thoughts," was what laid the foundation for modern Jewish politics.

Hamas messages must be challenged, watchdog says

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The recent Hamas victory in Palestinian parliamentary elections does not represent any real change in terms of policy toward Israel, according to Itamar Marcus, director of Palestinian Media Watch.

"All these principles from the Hamas charter [like Israel and Jews not having the right to exist] were actually being said all along by the Palestinian Authority in their textbooks [and on the PA's official television station]," Marcus said.

"If people had just been listening, they would have known that this was the direction in which their supposedly moderate leadership was leading the people," Marcus told a capacity crowd at Kehillat Shaarei Torah last week.

"We're not getting different leadership in terms of its ultimate goal. We're getting leadership that says it openly."

For peace to exist, he said, the Palestinian Authority will need a "completely different" leadership.

"If the western world isolates them to the point where leadership begins to collapse, then we have the potential for beginning a peace process... I don't think it will happen with any of the leaders we've seen."

Even if Iraq and Saudi Arabia fund the PA, without western political support, there could be such a collapse, Marcus believes. "If we continue to give them money and political support, we're not going to have peace."

His Jerusalem-based organization has spent the last eight years monitoring Arabic-language media – including sports pages, entertainment news and crossword puzzles – to learn what Palestinians have been saying among themselves, and particularly what message they were giving their children.

Marcus – who was a member of the Israeli delegation to the Tri-lateral (American, Israeli and Palestinian) Committee to Monitor Incitement, established under the Wye Accords – has presented PMW findings in Europe, the United States and Israel. He said that many Israeli politicians were not previously familiar with the material.

The organization, which currently operates on a $250,000 (US) annual budget, is trying to obtain more funding to expand its efforts.

In his presentation, Marcus cited a slew of everyday examples, all sanctioned by the former leadership of the Palestinian Authority: a teenagers' soccer tournament in which each team was named for a suicide bomber; a UNICEF-supported summer camp named for Wafa Idris, the first female suicide bomber; a Grade 10 history text published in 2004 that cites the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a czarist-era hoax alleging a Jewish conspiracy to take over the world; "historical" television programs portraying Jews as "monstrous, almost sub-human" caricatures; new school textbooks in which it appears that Israel doesn't exist; music videos that encourage violence; crossword puzzles with clues like "Jewish character trait" for the word "treachery;" and even a show for preschoolers in which a Muppet-like character talks about using an AK 47 [assault rifle] to commit a massacre.

"The message is incessant: Israel has no right to exist," said Marcus.

It will be difficult for Hamas to soften its message because its ideology is religion-based, he said. "They are sincerely religious. To say Israel has a right to exist is [for them] a rejection of Islam. I don't believe they are going to do this."

The Hamas charter is "literally a call for genocide in order to get to redemption."

Marcus showed a PA television diatribe by a Palestinian Muslim religious leader, who referred to Israel as a cancer, that Marcus said was significant for its complete lack of reference to land.

"To the world, [Palestinians] talk about the occupation. To their own, they talk about Israel's existence," he said.

The messages that Israel and Jews have no right to exist – and that Palestinians must be willing to die for Allah – must be challenged, he said.

"Eventually the western world must recognize that if they want to promote peace, there will not be a peace process on paper until there's a peace process in education as well, because only then will we be able to have serious peace into the next generation."

Camps for kids affected by terror seek counsellors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Koby Mandell Summer in Israel Programs, which help young victims deal with the aftermath of terror attacks, are reaching out to North American teens to join them for the summer.

Shuki Taylor, 26, co-ordinator of the programs, was in Toronto recently to spread the word about the two camps – an overnight camp and a brand new day camp – and speak to teens about volunteering their time as counsellors.

The camps, part of the Koby Mandell Foundation, are named for the son of Rabbi Seth and Sherri Mandell, who in 2001 at age 13, was stoned to death along with his friend Yosef Ish Ran, by Arab terrorists.

Koby's parents set up the foundation in order to help people translate the pain and suffering of tragedy into positive personal growth, deeper interpersonal relationships and active community leadership.

The foundation offers programs that provide relevant informal education and emotional and psychological support in formal group discussions and informal interactions.

The camps were formed for children ages seven to 18 who lost a loved one to terror, but Taylor says they have now extended their mandate to include youth in any type of crisis.

Most of the counsellors are former Camp Koby campers.

"With camp activities and therapeutic programming, kids have a great time and feel free to express their feelings to peers who really understand," Taylor says.

He got involved with the organization after he started a program for teens who lost friends in terrorist attacks.

"I knew that kids are reluctant to see therapists, so I asked some counsellors with experience in informal education to run support groups. It was hugely successful."

North American teens who join the camp program – there are about 40 spots available – will have the opportunity to learn the healing and recovery process through "light therapy," which involves art, music and drama.

"They will also learn how to run Israel advocacy programs in their schools and synagogues. The idea is to create a wider unification of the Jewish people," Taylor says.

Davida Shiff, a Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto student who worked at Camp Coby last summer, says she was "particularly moved by the strength and dedication to others that the campers demonstrated, despite the losses they have suffered.

"Unlike in the outside world, [they] are free to laugh without anyone questioning [their] right to have fun or to forget their pain for a moment. In the same way, if [they] cry, no one criticizes or judges them.

"These children exhibited a kindness towards each other [that was] unusual at any age. The ability of the campers to both empathize with and provide support for each other is inspiring."

Taylor says the type of teens who apply are those who can spend six weeks focusing on other people."We get a lot of support from people who want to do something meaningful, but we also want people to be part of what we do."

The cost to volunteer at the summer in Israel program is $5,490 (US) for the overnight camp, or $5,290 (US) for the day camp. Tuition includes round-trip airfare from New York and all program elements including touring and seminars.

Can this leopard change its blood-stained spots?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Hamas' unexpected landslide victory in the Jan. 25 Palestinian election resulted in a deluge of media reports and analysis. Each of the major Canadian dailies – the Globe and Mail, National Post and Toronto Star – published an editorial on the Hamas win, urging the international community and the Canadian government not to deal with the terrorist group unless it truly moderates its ways.

The Jan. 27 Globe editorial, "The elected Hamas," said that while the democratic will of the Palestinians must be respected, Israel and foreign governments have every reason to be fearful of what a Hamas victory portends.

The Globe noted the irony in the fact that Palestinian voters rejected President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party due to its ineptitude and corruption, and voted in a terrorist organization "pledging to establish peace, order and good government." (While Hamas did pledge to restore order and good government, it certainly did not promise peace with Israel). And a further irony was that "a terrorist organization has come to power by democratic means."

The Globe called on Hamas "to embrace non-violence by renouncing its intention to wipe Israel off the map and accepting Israel's right to exist side by side with a Palestinian state. Otherwise, the new Hamas government cannot expect the European Union and others to continue financing the Palestinian Authority."

However, the editorial concluded on a small note of optimism: "Incredible as it may seem, Hamas' victory in the topsy-turvy Middle East could be a slim opportunity for peace."

Like the Globe, the National Post editorial "The Pity of Hamasistan" (Jan. 27) allowed for the possibility that voters chose Hamas over Fatah from a desire to end corruption and achieve a better economic future, rather than to continue waging war on Israel. But "whatever [the] voters' motivation, they have empowered a terrorist movement that officially rejects the state of Israel's existence – indeed, that rejects any dialogue with Israel whatsoever."

The Post predicted that with Gaza already in chaos and foreign donors threatening to withhold money unless Hamas drops its extremist agenda, "there will be less pressure on Israel to make painful territorial concessions in the more strategic West Bank." Perhaps.

While more cautious than the Globe, the Post also said the situation could change if Hamas "makes a sincere and convincing show of renouncing terrorism in coming years, or if it is voted out of office." For now, the Post concluded, "the Palestinians seem a people incurably drawn to terrorism and its practitioners."

The Jan. 27 Toronto Star editorial, "Palestinian blow to Mideast peace," quoted Hamas' founding charter, "a poisonous text that refers to 'the Jews, the merchants of war.'... It denounces 'the Nazism of the Jews.' And warns that 'leaving the circle of conflict with Israel is a major act of treason.'" (This, of course, is being taught to Palestinian children in Hamas-run schools.)

The Star also warned: "Unless Hamas repudiates all this, Palestinians are fated to be led by a pariah regime and may well be shunned by the world." (Richard Gwyn summed up the dilemma facing Hamas and the West, when he wrote in his Jan. 31 Star column: "Somehow, democracy has to be preserved while religious totalitarianism and terrorism and racially inspired genocide have to be eliminated.")

Most Israeli analysts, including those on the left, doubt that Hamas will change. Unlike the secular PLO, which at least renounced rejectionist passages in its charter (even if that charter has never been rewritten as promised under Oslo), the religiously fundamentalist Hamas cannot retract its core anti-Jewish/anti-Israel (and anti-Christian) commitments.

"The essence of Hamas," argues Israeli writer Yossi Klein Halevi, "is a commitment to destroy the religious affront of Jewish sovereignty. For Hamas to 'moderate' would mean turning into an apostate of its own most sacred truth. If the process of moderation didn't happen to the less devout Fatah, which continues to reject Israel's legitimacy and now opposes terror only on temporary tactical grounds, it surely won't happen to Hamas." ("End Game: The Rise of Hamas and the Fall of Palestine" the New Republic online, Jan. 26.)

The hint by a small number of Hamas "spokesmen" that Hamas may agree to a long-term ceasefire with Israel is misleading rhetoric meant to forestall the cutting off of much-needed Western aid. It should not be seen by the world as a sign of genuine moderation.

Made-to-order medications: Thinking outside the bottle

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Pharmacist Murray Shore is enthusiastic about compounding medications – a growing and sometimes controversial field that creates custom-made drugs to meet individuals' needs.

For Shore, who owns the Toronto Compounding Shoppe, compounding is a creative endeavour. He works with physicians to solve medication problems – distasteful flavours, ingredient allergies, infants' tiny doses, nausea drugs that can't be taken orally – with custom formulations created for individual patients.

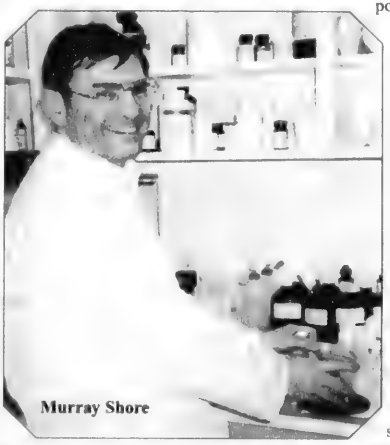
"Many pharmacists don't think out of the box," Shore says. Compounding calls for "peripheral thinking," using known drugs precisely to solve unique problems.

Compounding is not new. Seventy years ago, 60 per cent of all medications were compounded, and in Europe, many still are, but with the growth of drug companies, it represents only one per cent here, although consumers are starting to look beyond "one-size-fits-all" medications.

As the number of compounding pharmacies increases – there are now more than 3,000 worldwide – many are calling for greater regulation to ensure quality control and pharmacist education.

"I am quite concerned about the safety of compounded products," says Dr. Bruce Bouts, an Ohio physician and pharmacist.

Yet for many consumers, compounding serves a perceived need. In the heart of Toronto's Jewish community, one of Shore's specialties is kosher variations of mainstream medications.



Murray Shore

Materna, for instance, a popular prenatal supplement, contains non-kosher ingredients. Shore offers a compounded kosher version for the same price. He also makes ibuprofen syrup, since children's Motrin and Advil contain non-kosher glycerin.

Compounding isn't just for the humans in the family. Pharmacist Richard Stein, of The Medicine Shoppe on Bloor Street, says flavour is crucial in veterinary medication: "cats must like the taste." He compounds needed medications in flavours like tuna, beef, chicken, liver. While felines may love them, the smell can sometimes overwhelm humans, he says.

Compounding can also fill a demand for natural products, like hormone replacement therapy (HRT) using "bio-identical" hormones from soy and yam. And with compounding, not every drug has to be taken as a pill. Stein makes natural HRT in both oral and non-oral dosage forms, including capsules and suppositories.

Varying dosage forms can make a drug even more effective, he says. Topical medication for a child's mouth infection probably won't stay on for long. But if the child is given it as a gummy bear to suck on, it may work better. Stein cautions that dosages may not be exact when compounded in "candy" form (he, like Shore, also makes lollipops and popsicles), but that's not always crucial.

In compounding, "nothing is fixed," Stein says. Rather, pharmacists find solutions, saying, "in theory, this might do the job." While critics charge that this violates the evidence-based spirit of western medicine, in cases where patients cannot take another medication, Stein says it's worth a try.

Despite the generally higher price of compounded drugs, Stein and Shore both point out that they can actually save money, especially if nothing else will work. For example, the parents of a 2½-year-old came to Stein because the child couldn't take oral Biaxin for an ear infection. After three days of taking it in suppository form, the child was better.

It's also worthwhile to create smaller dosages that let patients taper off a particular medication. And Shore says most insurance companies do pick up the tab, though patients must pay first, and then seek reimbursement.

Other forms available include transdermal creams (active ingredients are absorbed through the skin), puffers which "spray" a topical powder evenly throughout the mouth, sublinguals (tablets placed under the tongue) and troches (lozenges).

Stein doesn't create injectable or inhalable drugs, which must be completely sterile. He says the biggest issue with these is liability.

In a tragic U.S. case, a small meningitis outbreak was caused by a compounded injection that was not sterile. There have been other unfortunate results with transdermals and other dosage forms, like a baby who developed testosterone toxicity after receiving a cross-contaminated cream.

Bouts recommends against any compounded drugs that are to be injected or inhaled, as well as sustained-release capsules, since dosage-release timing may vary dangerously.

"Pharmacists advertise precise and individual dosing, [but] studies show the opposite is true," says U.S. FDA expert Sarah Sellers. Sellers, a pharmacist, is strongly opposed to most compounding, particularly for non-essential uses such as reflavouring and kosher formulations.

Sellers concedes that "in rare cases, a pediatric patient may require a compounded product," but warns that because dosages may not always be precise, there's more "potential for poisonings and sub-therapeutic dosing."

In the United States, compounding is also becoming big business, with pharmacists recommending "in-house" versions of standard drug-company medications. "We don't do that," Stein says. "What's the point?"

Cover FX hides skin disorders without irritation

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

After spending 15 years searching for cosmetic products for patients with extremely sensitive skin – and being unable to find what she was looking for – Lee Graff decided to take the matter into her own hands.

Six years ago, Graff became the president and co-founder of Cover FX, a cosmetics company she says is finally catering to the needs of people who need the products the most.

When Graff began her career in 1985 as a corrective makeup specialist at the CosMedic Clinic at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre, she searched for products to bring back to the clinic to use on patients suffering from skin disorders, scars, burns and sensitive skin.

But she said finding a product that offered good coverage, looked natural and didn't irritate sensitive skin was not easy.

"I became frustrated with the lack of choices because everything was heavy. So, either you wore it and it was obvious that you were wearing a lot of makeup… or it caused irritation to the skin, making [the patients'] skin conditions worse," Graff said.

She spoke to Dr. Neil Shear, the head of dermatology at Sunnybrook, about her difficulty in finding the right cosmetics, and he suggested that if she knew exactly what she wanted, he could introduce her to a chemical engineer who could help turn her vision into a product.

At the time, Jenny Frankel held a job as a product developer at MAC Cosmetics, a leading cosmetic company. She agreed to meet with Graff.

"MAC is more about glamour and runway looks. When I met Lee, all of a sudden, everything else became frivolous. It became more about health than beauty," Frankel said.

In 2000, Graff, Shear and Frankel combined their efforts and expertise and developed a line of cosmetics called Cover FX that met the standards Graff had been searching for.

Before and after photos of using Cover FX.

"We realized that it wasn't enough for people to be told that it is only what's inside that counts," said Frankel, vice-president of the company.

She added that they spent a year and a half testing different textures and consistencies. They also created a 40-shade palette based on the skin tones of different ethnicities, to reflect Toronto's melting pot of different races.

Aside from powder and liquid foundations, Cover FX also makes bronzers, lipsticks and pressed powders.

But the most important feature of their line is that every product has a therapeutic benefit, ensuring that even people with the most sensitive, intolerant skin can enjoy it, Frankel said.

Shear co-developed an oil-free, fragrance-free, non-comedogenic (it doesn't clog pores and thus cause acne) line that offers protection from the sun and the environment, all the while concealing a patient's imperfections.

After testing the product on 1,500 people suffering from rosacea, a skin condition characterized by redness, pimples and broken blood vessels, Graff and Frankel knew they had filled a void in the cosmetics world.

Since CityTV ran a segment about Cover FX last year, the demand for its cosmetics skyrocketed to the point that there is a year-long waiting list for certain products, Graff said.

Last month, Graff was interviewed on the Today Show with Katie Couric and Matt Lauer and demonstrated their products on live models.

Cover FX is distributed across Canada at more than 250 Shoppers Drug Mart locations, select Jean Coutu and Racine pharmacies in Quebec, dermatology clinics and spas, as well as Nordstrum locations in the United States.

While the products were initially designed to give better coverage and more options to people who are limited as to what they can use, Frankel said that regardless of what a person wants to conceal, anyone can use the product.

"If all you know is minor under-eye circles, you want to cover it up because you think the whole world is looking at it," Frankel said.

"People are more confident about facing the world because when you look good, you feel great," Graff added.

Poor dental health linked to variety of ailments

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Howard Tenenbaum is a leading expert on periodontal (gum) disease and dental health and he has some important advice about your teeth. Brush and floss before every meal.

Not very surprising, that, but, whoa, did he say before every meal?

Haven't we been taught for generations to brush after a meal? So as to remove food particles that may cause tooth decay?

Yes, the doctor acknowledges, it is a good idea to rinse away any food that may remain in the mouth after eating, but if you want to truly affect your health in a positive way, clean your mouth before eating.

Tenenbaum, associate dean, diagnostic and biological sciences and professor of periodontology at the University of Toronto, has a somewhat counter-intuitive explanation for this approach to good health.

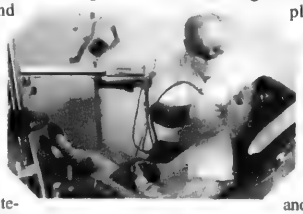
By brushing and flossing before you eat, you will reduce the risk of developing teeth that are sensitive to cold and heat. Bacteria in the mouth, he said, feed on starches and create acid, which softens the enamel on teeth. When you brush, you remove microscopic amounts of tooth enamel, leading eventually to sensitive teeth.

There are other good reasons to brush and floss and visit a dentist regularly, he continues.

Research that has become more persuasive in the last few years indicates there is a correlation – if not yet a proven cause and effect – between some oral diseases and systemic illnesses within the body.

Diabetes, heart disease, osteoporosis, respiratory ailments and low birthweight/early delivery babies all have been linked to poor dental health, he said.

Researchers studying the data are coming to believe more and more that these illnesses can be traced back to bacteria residing in the mouth. By brushing and flossing, many of those bacteria are removed and are not present to interact with carbohydrates and sugars in food. That keeps tooth decay down, but it also keeps down the number of bacteria that could cause or worsen gum disease. And it's bacteria entering the body through bloody gums that researchers believe can cause havoc in the body.



Something like five to 15 per cent of the population suffers from gum disease, Tenenbaum said.

Diabetes is the illness in which the link to gum disease is most evident. People with gum disease seem to develop diabetes and people with uncontrolled diabetes seem to develop gum disease. Gum disease does not cause diabetes, but it makes it hard to control the disease, he said.

The causal connection is still unclear, but research shows if you treat gum disease, you make it easier to control diabetes, he noted.

As for heart disease, stroke, osteoporosis and pre-term infant births, a cause and affect relationship has not yet been found. Researchers, however, have "biologically plausible explanations."

For example, bacteria can enter the bloodstream through diseased gums and cause blood platelets to clot together, possibly leading to a heart attack, he said.

Pneumonia, particularly in elderly patients confined to bed, has also been linked to gum disease. Current thinking suggests that bacteria in the mouth can be aspirated, inhaled and cause fluid buildup in the lungs.

A "weak association" has also been founded with osteoporosis – weakening of the bones – while research in the United States has also found a statistical connection between low birth-weight babies delivered prematurely and mothers' gum disease. A later study in England did not find that link, he added.

Smoking may be the most important factor that ties all these findings together, Tenenbaum, who also runs a clinical practice at Mount Sinai Hospital, said. It is a significant factor in heart disease, pre-term births, osteoporosis and gum disease.

Some epidemiologists even suggest that if you take smoking out of the equation, all disease associations would disappear.

"Smoking may be the central issue, here," he said. Lab tests show cigarette smoke's hydrocarbons can damage bone.

Dr. Jeffrey Erlich has been following the research on the link between gum disease and other illnesses for some time. A dentist in private practice for 30 years, Erlich said, "Most people with serious gum disease have not seen a dentist.

"The most recent studies say it's not reasonable to tell your patients 'floss or die'. But there is such a strong correlation – you'd have to be reckless not to pay attention to it," he said.

Erlich noted that the damage from gum disease is irreversible.

Gum disease is a chronic ailment and antibiotics are not a permanent fix. But to add further weight to the links between dental health and other illnesses, he noted it is recommended that anyone undergoing a dental procedure take antibiotics if they had recent medical procedures like a joint replacement.

"Statistically, flossing adds three years to your life," he said, though he notes it's not clear if that's only because of the flossing or because people concerned about dental health are also concerned about their general level of well-being.

L'chaim Retirement Home

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein with her mother Terry

Dear Judy: I want to thank you, Esther, and your outstanding staff for how beautifully you helped my mother make the transition to retirement life. She is so happy with her new friends and the loving attention she gets from the staff. I am so impressed: the staff doesn't just "work" there, they really care about the residents and their families, and treat everyone with such dignity and warmth. L'chaim doesn't feel at all like an institution, it feels like a family. It was an excellent choice!

Organization cares for elderly after the hospital

By KYLE GORDON
CJN Intern

Lisa Wiseman and her staff of registered nurses and caregivers are thrilled to be celebrating the 10th anniversary of Eldercare Home Health.

"I didn't think it would be 10 years," Wiseman said about the in-home elder-care company she founded in December 1995.

Lisa Wiseman

Wiseman, a registered nurse and former nurse manager at the Queen Elizabeth Centre and Baycrest, was concerned with the level of assistance elderly patients were receiving when they left the hospital.

"Once the patients were discharged into the community they were not getting the support required for a safe recovery. The patients were not doing well because they didn't have the basics," Wiseman said.

She complained about this for years until her colleagues finally said, "If you think you can do better why don't you try."

Ten years later, Eldercare Home Health has become one of Toronto's most respected in-home elder-care providers.

"I think it's a great way to provide care. You can see the results – it's making people's lives better," Wiseman said.

Her team of 70 registered nurses and caregivers are dedicated to meeting the needs of their 80-, 90- and 100-year-old clients. The caregivers provide their patients with companionship and assist with bathing, personal care, meal preparation and all activities associated with daily living. They also arrange for physiotherapists and other professionals to provide assessment and treatment as required.

"It is really important that we understand the needs of the clients and do things specifically for them," Wiseman said. This includes pairing the Jewish clients with caregivers who understand Judaism and kashrut.

The caregivers have even attended weddings and bar/bat mitzvahs with their clients.

"Sometimes our patients need help getting dressed for a special occasion or they can't dance the whole evening, so we send a caregiver. We have done quite a few events like this," Wiseman said.

Fran Wolfe, a geriatric nurse clinician in emergency at North York General Hospital, is so impressed with Wiseman's assessment skills and her ability to match a client with the perfect caregiver each time. Wolfe said Eldercare Home Health is the only private agency she uses for her patients.

"The feedback I receive is always very positive. The clients and their family members are always very happy and pleased with the help," Wolfe said.

"In all my years knowing Lisa, I have never heard about one caregiver not getting along or meeting the needs of the client. This is a testament to Lisa's skills in hiring people who are excellent caregivers," she added.

Herald Geller was also impressed with the care and attention his 90-year-old mother, Anna Geller, received from Eldercare Home Health while resiging at Baycrest.

"My mother's recovery is in no small part due to the caregivers and the attention they have given my mother," wrote Geller in a letter to Wiseman.

Long-term care insurance key to independence, dignity

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

It's a tough scenario to envision, maybe even harder than drawing up your own will: what will happen if you're incapacitated for life? Will you live at home or in a facility? Who will foot the bill? A growing number of Canadians are answering these questions with long-term care (LTC) insurance.

Everybody hopes for a long, active, healthy retirement, but it doesn't always happen. Statistics show that almost one-third of us will be disabled by the age of 75 and almost half by age 85.

The most common type of long-term care insurance functions much like disability insurance, as an income supplement following a triggering event. Long-term care insurance hinges on six standard activities of daily living (ADLs): bathing, dressing, eating, maintaining continence, toileting and transferring.

Most LTC claims begin when a policyholder requires assistance in at least two out of these six ADLs, or experiences cognitive impairment. Once a claim starts, following an "elimination period," benefits can either run for a specified period or indefinitely – the rest of the policyholder's life.

Policy costs vary depending on gender: women – who generally live longer – can expect to pay about ten per cent more. For a non-smoking male in his 60s, a typical policy might cost $3,388 annually.

But the major factor in the cost of a policy is age. "The older you get, the more expensive it becomes," says David Breslin, a semi-retired toy manufacturer who entered the LTC insurance business in December 2004. Costs rise steeply – even triple – once you grow closer to an age at which you may need care. You must also be fully independent in all ADLs when purchasing a policy.

"We're very busy; there's a lot of interest," Breslin says. While anyone 30 and up can buy a policy, most are between 45 and 65. "The meat of the business is someone in their 50s who either has a parent who requires [care] or is disabled to some degree and they [the children] see the writing on the wall."

Breslin grew interested in LTC insurance when a family member spent several months at Baycrest following a stroke. The family member was later sent home, but still required care. "He's going to be 94 at the end of [January]," Breslin says. "He's not sick, he's just 94."

This is an important distinction: someone who's too well for an institution may still not function independently. Breslin's relative currently "pays $50,000 yearly for a caregiver who helps him with transferring: from the couch to the bathroom to the kitchen." For eight hours a day, seven days a week, the caregiver "helps him bathe, helps him dress – he's pretty sharp, but he's still 94."

"Luckily, he can afford it," says Breslin. For those who can't, government assistance is minimal. A low-income senior might have help with showering, "every couple of days. If you're alone, that's it."

When Breslin saw the actual costs of care, he purchased a policy… and started his new business, assisting others in choosing LTC insurance.

"The beauty of [it] is that you can stay at home," he says. "Ninety-plus per cent want to stay at home, no matter what." Having the income guarantees flexibility, in most cases, to decide which type of care is most appropriate.

"It gives you an income and protects your assets." It also protects two generations – parents and children. Parents can keep their dignity, their lifestyle. "They don't have to go to their children for help. You can remain independent even with a serious setback."

Breslin pauses briefly to crunch the numbers. "[LTC] insurance will give you $5,000 a month in tax-free benefits… What you have to have in the bank to generate the money to pay for that, at five per cent, it's like $2.5 million. How many people have that money? And if they do, they're reluctant to spend it."

Though he's happy there's enough interest to stay busy, he says he's still "trying to create an awareness." LTC insurance has been around in the United States for 18 years but is still relatively new here.

"In the U.S., LTC [insurance] premiums are tax-deductible. If people went to their MP and made this a tax deduction… [the government] would save so much money. This would take off in a second."

Maybe a tax deduction would be just the thing to make that tough scenario – the prospect of disability and long-term care – a little easier to swallow. Breslin can be reached at 416-920-8008.

Modern midwifery in Ontario: 10 years and beyond

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

During my most recent pregnancy, I returned from a prenatal checkup and my daughter, who is eight, asked what the doctor said. I told her I wasn't seeing a doctor, but a lady who helps other ladies have babies.

"Oh," she said, "kind of like a midwife?"

To my kids, midwifery – from the story of Shifrah and Puah in the book of Exodus – is the most Jewish thing in the world. But midwifery has come a long way since these heroic women rescued babies from Pharoah's soldiers, especially in Ontario, where 2004 marked 10 years since it was integrated into the health-care system – fully licensed and government-funded.

A midwife (which means "with woman") is a specialist in normal and low-risk birth. Accredited midwives are primary caregivers available to clients 24 hours a day, seven days a week, throughout pregnancy, during labour and for six weeks afterwards.

For many, the biggest surprise is that it's not just for home births. "We can and happily do deliver in hospitals," says midwife Naomi Brooks, who practises with Toronto's Midwife Alliance.

If a woman prefers to stay home, a midwife can also help, once she determines that it's safe for mother and baby. "One-third will initially choose home [birth]," Brooks says, but "maybe half of those actually end up with a home birth."

Deanna Caro, who gave birth with a midwife last year at Mount Sinai Hospital, found it "comforting to know that the medical equipment and personnel are there if you need them, and if you don't, you can just labour undisturbed." She delivered naturally and chose to take her baby home the same day.

Prenatal appointments often bring other pleasant surprises. "There are 45-minute scheduled appointments," Caro says. "They really take their time to address any concerns that you have."

Brooks says midwifery operates on the principle of informed choice, whereas obstetricians use informed consent, where they say, "I'd like to do this to you, OK?" without presenting other options.

With informed choice, "we try to let you know if there are other choices available and what the implications are… down the road."

Choosing home or hospital birth is one example, as is – in certain cases – a woman's choice to try delivering vaginally following a Caesarean section.

There are currently more than 300 registered midwives in Ontario, regulated by the 1991 Midwifery Act, which also outlines their responsibility to transfer care to a physician under certain circumstances, for example in a breech (bottom-first) baby or if the mother has high blood pressure.

The midwife weighs a baby at home with a hanging scale.

"There are a lot of misconceptions about what midwives do," Brooks says, some going back to superstitions involving midwifery and witchcraft. "[Midwifery] is a five-year university program with a very in-depth clinical training; we're trained by obstetricians and midwives."

Just to graduate, she says, midwives must participate in at least 100 births.

There isn't much a midwife can't do to support a healthy pregnancy and birth. Midwives perform diagnostic tests, order ultrasounds, administer pain relief, suture tears and even write certain related prescriptions. Unlike in some parts of the world, "we don't need to rely on the good graces of a friendly family doctor or obstetrician in order to get routine tests done."

But despite high-tech conveniences, modern midwifery is still high-touch, especially during labour and following birth, when many physicians leave the scene. Midwives can also offer choices like water births or including extended family or children.

Caro appreciated having familiar women at her baby's birth and afterwards. Should an emergency require a doctor's intervention, the midwife can usually remain as an observer and assistant so that she's still there for the mother.

Brooks reassures clients, "What makes home birth safe is that we don't stay home if it's not safe."

After birth, a midwife usually performs all mother and baby care at home. Caro's midwife visited on Day 1, Day 3 and Day 5.

In-vitro fertilization can help some couples

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The birth of a child is commonly viewed as one of life's greatest miracles, a belief that makes it particularly crushing for those who yearn for a baby but are unable to have one.

About one in every eight couples in Canada experiences some form of infertility, generally defined as the inability to conceive after having unprotected sex for at least a year.

While about 15 per cent of the factors contributing to infertility are still a mystery, medical professionals have identified a number of key reasons for it.

Dr. Ellen Greenblatt, clinical director of the reproductive biology and IVF (in-vitro fertilization) units at Mount Sinai Hospital, says things that can impede a couple's ability to conceive include ovulation problems, fallopian tube damage or disease, and low sperm counts.

"Part of it also relates to age, [especially] in urban centres, where people tend to start their families later," says the doctor, who is also an associate professor at the University of Toronto.

The course of action couples with infertility problems decide to take if they are intent on having a baby depends on the nature of their problem.

Greenblatt, a specialist in IVF, says the patients fall into two main categories.

"The first are patients that have an absolute need for IVF [because] they have bilaterally blocked fallopian tubes or no fallopian tubes," she explains.

"The other group of patients… [generally] have really severe sperm problems."

Greenblatt notes some other patients who choose this assisted reproduction method may be couples who have long-standing infertility issues or women in their early 40s who are looking for an aggressive treatment because of their age.

IVF is a detailed medical process. The treatment initially involves using medications to stimulate the development of multiple eggs.

Once these eggs develop and mature, they are removed from the woman and mixed or injected with sperm, either from her partner or a donor.

After the eggs and sperm fertilize and grow into embryos, an average of two embryos are put back into the women's uterus, in the hope that a healthy pregnancy will follow.

Since IVF started being performed in the late 1970s, thousands of babies have been born this way.

The Canadian Fertility and Andrology Society (CFAS) reports that about one-third of women under the age of 35 who go through IVF successfully give birth. That dips to 22 per cent for women between 35 and 39.

The rates of congenital abnormalities for those born via IVF aren't any different than those born naturally, according to the CFAS.

As with any procedure, there are drawbacks. For instance, women may experience side effects from the fertility medication they take, or in some unusual cases, ovarian hyperstimulation syndrome may arise.

"Probably the greatest complication is the risk of multiple pregnancies," Greenblatt says.

There is also a significant price tag for IVF.

In the orthodox Jewish community, some find reproductive technologies objectionable.

But, Greenblatt says, "Halachah is subject to interpretation. It really depends on who is interpreting it and which rabbi you go to for advice."

For those who see some aspects of IVF as contrary to Halachah, such as the need to produce a sperm sample, Greenblatt says there are innovations.

"To produce the [sperm] sample needed, a couple can have intercourse with a condom that has a hole in it," she says.

"So theoretically, there's still a chance the wife would be impregnated and we are able to collect the sperm sample."

IVF and other forms of fertility treatments can be emotionally demanding for couples.

Greenblatt notes there are a number of supportive community groups that cater to orthodox couples, including A TIME (a Torah Infertility Medium of Exchange) and Small Wonders.

Creates small, customized orders

Bouts says patients should avoid compounded drugs if a generic or brand-name version is available.

And, while some U.S. pharmacies make large quantities to compete with drug companies, Stein creates only small, customized orders to fill individuals' needs.

He also credits the backlash, at least in part, to pharmaceutical companies' fears. But "we're not a threat to 'Big Pharma' – we're an add-on." He favours voluntary self-regulation through organizations such as the International Academy of Compounding Pharmacists.

Despite concerns, compounding continues to grow as patients become aware that it can help "make the medicine go down."

Shore says "doctors will call and ask how to do something," and Stein is enjoying "more and more challenges," and loves the professional satisfaction.

Reflecting on all the pregnant women he's helped, all the Crohn's patients, the teenagers and especially all the babies, Shore is also clearly convinced he's changing medicine for good.

Nutritionists can help make lifestyle changes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

According to holistic nutritionists Barbara Silverstein and Ester Kagan, a healthy lifestyle is all about balance.

"Our goal is to help our clients balance a healthy diet with an active lifestyle," Silverstein says.

The two got together when their children were students at the Toronto Heschel School and the women discovered they were both taking courses at the Institute of Holistic Nutrition, as they both wanted to learn more about the role of food in preventing and fighting disease.

They soon realized they also shared an interest in weight loss, and eventually went on to form Natural Balance Weight Loss Centre.

Silverstein, who trained as a social worker, says one aspect of holistic nutrition is to look at the whole person. "We don't just give our clients a list of foods, we encourage them to make lifestyle changes.

"There is often an emotional component to eating, and we try to address that so we can help our clients stop the behaviour."

People who are overweight often have high cholesterol and blood pressure, diabetes, arthritis and gastro-intestinal ailments," Kagan says.

"As they lose weight, many of these conditions improve. People with Type II diabetes can even lower their medication through weight loss and exercise."

Some of their weight loss clients have chronic conditions such as bowel disorders, gall bladder problems or acid reflux, and the nutritional plans must be customized accordingly.

Ester Kagan, left, and Barbara Silverstein

While many of their clients follow customized diets, there is an underlying common denominator to most of the plans, Kagan says. "The basic diet is health-promoting. We limit processed food, white rice, white bread and sugar. Those are foods that are detrimental to our health. Try whole foods, grains and legumes because they are fibre-rich."

They also encourage clients to eat lots and lots of fresh vegetables, which are "critical to long-term healing and weight loss," Silverstein adds.

She stresses the importance of maintaining a healthy balance of carbohydrates and protein because "over the long term, high protein diets are wearing on the organs and bones."

Having treats, however, can fit into a holistic lifestyle, she says. "We all socialize around food. If you eat well most of the time, eating a piece of cheesecake or enjoying a rich gourmet meal on weekends is fine.

"Our aim is to have people feel comfortable around forbidden foods. They shouldn't berate themselves for eating something. Enjoy it and move on…

Jenn Rosen

"When embarking on a healthy lifestyle people need to think in terms of long-range goals," Silverstein says. "Changing your lifestyle is a slow and gradual process, but it works over time. It's like the tortoise and the hare. Ultimately slow and steady wins the weight loss race."

Holistic nutritionist Jenn Rosen, a graduate of the Canadian School of Natural Nutrition, says that what you apply to your body is as important as what you put in your body.

"Everything you put on your body goes into your bloodstream, so if you're putting on toxins it's as if you're eating them."

Rosen, who markets personal care products, says consumers should read the ingredients on these products just as they read ingredients on food labels. "[Try] to stay away from propylene glycol [in such products] as skin care, shampoo and baby wipes. That is the [same substance] used in antifreeze.

"Children whose bodies are still developing can get six times the toxins [of an adult]. It is crucial to be aware of what you're using."

Eating healthy without the stress

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

People who say they are simply too busy to cook and eat healthy to lose weight no longer have that excuse to fall back on.

With services in Toronto such as Nutrition in Motion, eating healthy has never been easier.

For those who enjoy eating gourmet meals, but are too busy to maintain a healthy diet, Cliff Peskin and Rebecca Malen will help by delivering South Beach diet-inspired meals right to your door.

After taking a medical course on health and nutrition while volunteering in the army medical corps in Israel, Peskin returned to Canada and decided to start a company that would help Canadians who are addicted to fast food make healthier choices.

A year-and-a-half ago, he started cooking low-fat meals in his parents' kitchen, put up posters in the Forest Hill Village and built a website in hopes of advertising his new venture.

As word of Peskin's project spread and it gained popularity, he moved out of his parents' kitchen into a bigger one and hired chefs.

Today, the 26-year-old company president and Malen, 22, the vice-president and co-founder of the company, have moved into an office at Bathurst Street and Eglinton Avenue and work with Catered Affairs by Chapman's, a Toronto-based catering company.

The program begins when Malen, who is also a personal trainer and a weight loss analyst, puts information about a client into a database and generates meals and recipes based on their individual needs.

The meal plans are then given to Chapman's, where the meals are prepared, and every day, the client receives a cooler bag with three gourmet meals, and two nutritious snacks.

The kinds of dishes that are available include Asian beef salad, Italian zucchini frittata, and veal forestiere.

Peskin said Nutrition in Motion also has a program called Nim Kids, which is tailored to children who are battling their weight.

Children eat healthier versions of the meals they love, such as pita pizzas and chicken fingers.

"We have healthy meals to get children in better shape, and it teaches them what's healthy and what's not," Peskin said.

The response to the service has been phenomenal, Peskin said.

His company serves about 60 to100 people a day, and even has clients who have been with the program for eight months.

"They have no intention of stopping," Peskin said of his long-term clients. "It can become slightly addictive."

One of the most rewarding aspects of his job, he added, is when people write about the success they've enjoyed because of the program.

"They say, 'I've lost 50 pounds, you've changed my life. I don't know where I would be without your service,'" he said.

The food is not kosher. However the company doesn't serve pork or dishes with both milk and meat, and kosher meals are available upon request.

For more information about Nutrition in Motion, call 416-486-1646.

Moksha yoga is really hot stuff

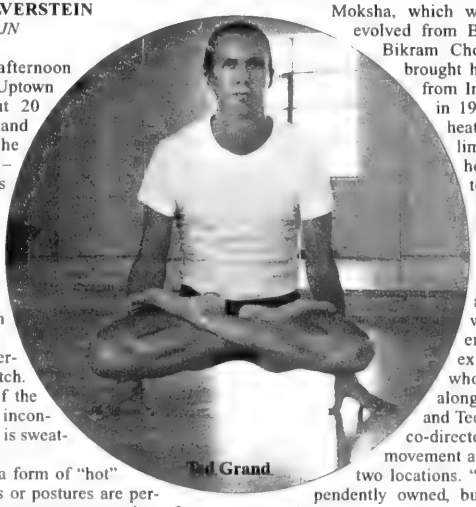
By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

At first glance, the afternoon class at Moksha Yoga Uptown seems typical. About 20 people of different sizes and shapes – many, clad in the trendy Lululemon yoga gear – contort their bodies in various poses.

They move in unison as they follow the directives of the young, lithe instructor leading them in the practice of Moksha yoga, literally one of the hottest forms of yoga in the country.

The pace is slow and deliberate as people breath and stretch. Despite the low-key nature of the class, there is an obvious incongruity: everyone in this studio is sweating profusely.

That's because Moksha is a form of "hot" yoga, which means the asanas or postures are performed in rooms heated to temperatures anywhere from 99 to 102 F or 39 to 41 C.



Ted Grand

Moksha, which was devised in Toronto, evolved from Bikram yoga, named for Bikram Choudhury, the guru who brought his system of "hot" yoga from India to the United States in 1972. He claimed that the heat made the muscles more limber and that the sweat helped the body release toxins.

In the late 1990s, the Bikram yoga movement grew and spread to Toronto. The creators of Moksha initially trained as Bikram teachers, but went on to create a different hot yoga movement, explains Natalia Brajak, who co-founded Moksha along with Jessica Robertson and Ted Grand. Brajak is now a co-director of the Moksha yoga movement as well as a co-director of two locations. "All the studios are independently owned, but we function within a community."

She's quick to point out the differences between Moksha and Bikram yoga: "We practise upper body strengthening poses and hip openers that you wouldn't find in the Bikram. We also practise different sequences and the number of poses are different. We do more poses in a class [than Bikram]."

She notes that Bikram follows a more rigid order of postures. "In Moksha, there's more variation from class to class and we introduce modifications for students, whereas Bikram sticks to the sequence they always practise."

Brajak adds that Bikram requires the use of a carpet. "We didn't think it was healthy to sweat on a carpet. Our floors are reclaimed hardwood or cork, a sustainable product. We're very environmentally conscious."

She stresses that the heat relaxes the muscles. "It makes the connective tissue more pliable and that helps improve flexibility and reduces potential stiffness and soreness the next day.

"It seems to be the perfect temperature for a person to sweat, but it's not so intense as to cause thermo-dehydration."

Brajak notes that the temperature in the room is the same as that outdoors in some parts of India. "You would be in that heat and humidity."

Moksha aims for a "calm mind, fit body and inspired life," she says. "The practice helps us to see and live in the world in a more calm and peaceful way and to improve our physical heath."

The various poses are beneficial for hormone regulation and glandular function, she says.

Brajak explains one of the reasons the new movement was formed was because Bikram yoga training could only be done in Los Angeles and the cost for teacher training was prohibitive for many people, given that the trainees were required to live in LA for two months. "We wanted to provide more local and accessible teachers training."

She says Moksha yoga has experienced significant growth since its launch in May 2004. There are five studios in the Greater Toronto Area – three in Toronto, one in Oakville and one in Richmond Hill. Nationally, there are studios in Vancouver, Calgary, and Montreal, with new studios set to open in Edmonton and Halifax. There is also international interest: there is a studio on the verge of opening in Trinidad, and Moksha classes are being offered in yoga studios in England,Taipei and Hong Kong.

"It's great. We're excited about how things have taken off," Brajak says. "We took a big chance by making the changes and creating Moksha. We followed our hearts."

Pilates can help with sciatica, herniated discs

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

To the outside world, Tracey Foreman, a long-time gymnast and gymnastics coach looked like the picture of health. However, unknown to most people, Foreman suffered from chronic pain.

"I had a bad back and a bad knee. I tried chiropractors and physio for two years. Nothing helped. I did not know what it was like not to have pain."

One day, she tried Pilates, a form of exercise that incorporates stretching, breathing, and the strengthening of the core or abdominal muscles. Foreman found that her pain dissipated for six hours. "I couldn't believe it," she recalls. "The next time I did Pilates, I was pain-free for two days. I just kept going back. Eventually, I had no back pain. I was a completely new me."

Foreman, who was a personal trainer at the time, went on to become a certified Pilates instructor. She has been teaching for seven years and in 2001, she opened what is now called the Fluid Pilates and Fitness Studio (416-785-5905), in the Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street area (485 Lawrence Ave. W.). For about the last two years, she has been sharing space with colleague Mark Gutkin. They both offer private and semi-private, as well as small group classes.

"We're more of a boutique Pilates studio," Gutkin says. "There are generally less than eight people in the group classes. The advantage of a small studio is that people get the type of attention they need to do the exercises and the moves properly and to eliminate any chance of injury."

Gutkin, a certified Pilates instructor for seven years, as well as a Thai yoga message practitioner, also became involved in Pilates as a means of dealing with pain. He had an injured shoulder that did not heal until he took up Pilates.

Pilates is named for Joseph Pilates, the originator of the technique. Pilates emigrated from Germany in the 1930s to escape the Nazis and settled in New York City, where he opened his first North American movement studio. Gutkin notes that while some of the origins of Pilates comes from yoga postures and stretches, Pilates emphasizes practical and active living, in contrast to yoga, which tends to be geared to enhancing meditation.

"In yoga, you're also holding the poses for a long period," says Foremen. "Some people can't hold the poses that long. In Pilates, you're moving through the poses constantly. Moving makes you fluid and mobile like you were when you were a kid."

She says that when she started out as a Pilates instructor, much of her work was in helping to rehabilitate people with injuries. "Pilates can help people with certain aches and pain, like sciatica and herniated discs. Now, many of the people I started with are pain free. They just come for fitness and to maintain their gains."

Tracey Foreman and Mark Gutman, pilates teachers at Fluid Pilates and Fitness Studio, demonstrate how to use the specialized equipment. [Barbarta Silverstein photo]

Gutkin's work also tends to be rehabilitative in nature. In fact, he has created Restore Your Body, a program of small group classes geared to people middle-aged and older, who are contending with chronic pain. "It's a path to pain-free living," he says. "I devised the program because so many people over 50 have daily aches and pains that become cumulative over time."

Pilates, according to Foreman, also offers many additional health benefits: it stimulates the circulatory system, increases energy levels, releases toxins and boosts endorphins, mood-enhancing chemicals produced in the brain.

Another advantage of Pilates is its appeal to a wide age group, continues Foreman. "My clients range between 14 and 80. The majority are in their early 30s to early 70s. I have an 80-year-old client who's in better shape than most people I know."

Both instructors recommend starting with some private lessons to learn the basic techniques. Foreman points out that people derive more benefit from group classes when they start with private sessions because they and their instructor have a better understanding of their bodies. "I know if their shoulders are tight or if their hips are not aligned and where their imbalances are."

She advises doing Pilates at least twice a week, with three times a week being ideal.

Pilates is also a great way to improve your appearance, she adds. "You're streamlining the body. The muscles become long, lean and toned, but not bulky.

"You can also burn up to 400 calories in a class because it's cardiovascular exercise. When I first started doing Pilates, I went down two full clothing sizes."

Wen-Do teaches women, girls 'to fight back'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After taking a basic course with Wen-Do, a women's self-defence organization, Joy Levy began a new career.

"I loved what they had to offer, and I took the path of becoming an instructor," says Levy, 32, a Thornhill mother of two young children.

The philosophy behind Wen-Do, a feminist based non-profit organization, is that in a male-dominated society, women's experience and fear of violence is typically different from men's and, therefore, it's vital for women to have access to self-defence courses taught by and for women.

Wen-Do believes that women – whether they are old, young, athletic, non-athletic, disabled or non-disabled – can use their bodies effectively to resist or defuse violent situations.

"We teach women and girls to be resourceful and to surprise their attacker. They learn to aim at vulnerable targets where their strength will be effective, and not to struggle against the attacker's arms or chest. Even running is a form of self-defence," Levy says.

"There is also a lot of verbal self-defence. This is our chance to find our voice and our inner strength. If a woman is in trouble she should yell '911.' If she yells 'Help,' she's not explaining what she needs."

Citing Wen-Do statistics, Levy says that 81 per cent of women who run, 68 per cent of women who use physical force, and 63 per cent of women who yell or scream will avoid sexual assault.

Joy Levy

Any girl has the right to go out on the street, Levy says, "and we teach them to fight back. Too often, women are told to control their behaviour for safety's sake. That is the wrong message. Wen-Do does not blame the victim.

"But we don't just teach physical techniques. We combine the martial arts with discussions about harassment and domestic and sexual assault, and we inform women about their rights."

For instance, she says, we may teach elementary school girls about bullying, talk to teens about sexual harassment, and teach young adults about their rights in the workplace.

"We talk a lot about why things happen and where they could happen," Levy says. "The most likely places where a woman could be attacked are at home, at school, or at work. Out on the street is fourth on the list."

Wen-Do instructors spend time relating success stories, such as one about a five-year-old girl who fought off an attacker. "These stories are empowering and enlightening."

The organization runs basic 15-hour courses that are open to the public, and courses can be run privately, Levy says.

"We try to keep classes down to about 20 women. For me, teaching the course has been tremendously rewarding. I've met women from all walks of life, and I've grown a new appreciation for womanhood," she says.

"Girls come in and tell my they have no strength, but they leave saying 'I didn't know I could do that.' It's not about strength. It's about how we use our body parts."

Class time is also a time for women to get together and talk about current issues, Levy says. "They can talk openly, and they know it's confidential."

Repetitive strain can come from work or play

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Sitting at your desk while you punch away at the keyboard and click on a mouse can be taxing on your body.

Over time, the drooped shoulders, craned neck and wrist use may cause a repetitive strain injury, or RSI.

"RSI refers to an injury where muscles get overused," says Dr. Heather Tick, director of the RSI Clinic at the Integrated Pain Treatment Centre in Toronto.

"We're constantly injuring ourselves in our daily lives and constantly repairing ourselves, but the time you run into trouble is when the injury exceeds the ability of the body to heal. Then you start collecting injuries."

Dr. Heather Tick applies a treatment to a patient.

More than two million Canadians suffer from RSI.

Tick says patients will typically come to the clinic complaining about pain in their forearm, such as in the wrist or elbow, or lamenting that their neck gets stiff or that their shoulders feel achy.

While office work is a frequent culprit, Tick says overuse of muscles from pleasurable activities, such as playing the piano, can also contribute to RSI.

After questioning patients about their pain and their lifestyle habits, Tick says, she does a comprehensive physical examination.

"From top to bottom, I look at the alignment of the spine, alignment of their shoulder posture and of the head," she explains.

"I look for a specific physical sign… to show muscle shortening, because this is generally a condition of shortened muscle [which leads to] reduced range of motion."

Once the physical signs of RSI have been identified, Tick offers her patients treatment options ranging from workplace stretches to intramuscular stimulation (IMS).

"IMS [involves] the use of acupuncture needles, but not in the theory and practice of Chinese medicine, but based on what we know from western medicine in terms of function and dysfunction of muscle," she says.

"Needles are put into the tightest part of the muscle, which gives them the quickest release and gets the range of motion back the fastest."

Some of the other treatment options include trigger point release, physiotherapy, massage, Pilates exercises and stress management sessions.

At the clinic, which opened in 1993, Tick and her colleagues employ a holistic practice, whereby mind and body are approached in a joint fashion.

"The mind is an integrated part of the body," Tick says.

"We are extremely aware you cannot separate one from the other."

That's why the treatment centre's staff includes experts in physical, psychological and emotional health who work as a team.

"Whether it's the person doing the acupuncture or the person doing laser therapy, we collaborate around the care of our patients," Tick says.

While some medical professionals were initially leery of RSI diagnosis and treatments, Tick points to the high rates of treatment success to illustrate the clinic's effectiveness.

"Worker's compensation started telling us that their rate of success was 13 per cent and we are better than 70 per cent," Tick says.

"This is a high success rate with a patient group that traditionally has a low success rate."

What's more, in about 95 per cent of cases, Tick says, the patients she treats are able to continue working despite RSI.

"Therapy does work, and we can keep the vast majority of our patients at work, productive in the jobs they want to do," she says.

Tick concedes that many of our lifestyle choices, including the enjoyable and seemingly healthy ones, can result in RSI.

That's why balance is key.

"It's important to balance the types of activities we do," she explains.

"When you see people who are keyboarding for a living and then they spend their evening surfing the net, not gong out for a walk, they're at higher risk."

Prevention also goes a long way in stopping strains before they start.

"Dong workplace stretches for the neck and forearm is useful," she offers.

"I also like the option of a sit-and-stand workstation, where you have the option of moving your equipment up or down and… having somebody with ergonomics knowledge look at the works station and how people are using it."

JACS: where kids with addictions can go for help

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Gordon Hayward speaks to the parents of children battling addiction, he encourages them to realize they have much to be thankful for.

"I tell everyone I'm jealous that their kids are alive and that they have an opportunity to learn," he says. "That opportunity was denied to me through ignorance."

Seventeen years ago, Gordon's son Benji, 14, drowned in Lake Ontario after taking LSD during a rock concert.

In retrospect, Hayward not only wishes he had helped his son before it was too late, but also laments that there was no established Jewish organization for addicts to offer support.

Today, people like the Haywards do have somewhere to turn.

JACS Toronto, which stands for Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependant Persons and Significant Others, is a place where addicts and their families can discuss their dilemmas, as well as a conduit to effective treatment options.

Zalman Goldman, right, director JACS Toronto, and Gordon Hayward, chair of the outreach and education committee.

"If someone has a problem with drugs, we very quickly refer them to whatever treatment is appropriate," says JACS Toronto director Zalman Goldman.

Meetings are held at the group's 858 Sheppard Ave. W. location in an anonymous, non-judgmental format.

"If we have a mother who is crying about her daughter who is 15 and out of control, we direct her to where she can properly get help," says Hayward, who chairs the agency's outreach and education committee.

"When kids come, they find that they're not alone and are here with other Jews."

There are also Friday night dinners and out-of-town retreats.

An educational program for teens, named in honour of Benji Hayward, sends volunteers to schools to discuss the dangers of addictions and inform youths about available resources.

"In the last six or seven months, we've gone and spoken to more than 7,000 teenagers... in public high schools that have very high Jewish student ratios," Goldman says.

The speakers have also gone to camps, and Goldman notes they would like to increase the number of schools they address.

"There are 1,300 Jewish teenagers in this city... but since September, we have only seen 60 of them," Goldman relates.

Since starting up in 2000, JACS has received more than 8,000 individual crisis calls.

The group has four staff members, more than 100 volunteers and five committees.

Although JACS receives funding from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, money is tight and the group is always looking for ways to raise cash.

They recently celebrated their fifth anniversary with a fundraiser at Vaughan City Playhouse, with a performance of Fiddler on the Roof.

"What we wanted to do... was find an event where people could have a good time that was family-oriented, and at the same time, raise money," Goldman says.

Addictions, substance abuse affect 10% of us

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Addictions and substance abuse have been deemed "gentile" problems by some in the Jewish community.

The reality is that like our non-Jewish neighbours, this disease affects the lives of many of our own.

"Communal numbers say 10 per cent of [Jews in the Greater Toronto Area] are affected," says Zalman Goldman, director of Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependant Persons and Significant Others (JACS) Toronto, a support and treatment referral agency.

"But I've never met a [Jewish] person who doesn't know someone who is [an addict]."

Goldman says Jewish addicts are a diverse group, spanning all denominations and social strata.

"Addiction is a disease," he says.

"People need to cover up what's going on in their life and will find whatever substance, sport or whatever it takes to make them feel comfortable."

While many of us may find an alluring interest that we engage in often, that doesn't make us addicts.

Experts believe that when you reach a point where you're channelling most of your energy toward gambling, shopping or whatever it may be and your life is being negatively impacted as a result, you are an addict.

Addicts are also usually unable to control their addictive behaviour and may be strongly in denial about their problem.

Studies have shown some people may be genetically predisposed to addictive behaviour, and if you grow up in a setting where addictive behaviours were modelled to you, such as in a home with parents who smoke, that may be a factor contributing to your own addiction.

Before an addict endeavours to seek help, they generally need to come to grips with the fact their addiction has serious repercussions.

Such a realization can be quite painful and may not arise until a major life incident shakes their world significantly, such as being arrested or getting into a serious accident.

So where do addicts turn for treatment?

It depends on the specifics of the problem.

"If it's alcohol or drugs, there are different centres to go to," notes Gordon Hayward, a JACS volunteer who chairs the agency's outreach and education committee.

For instance, while a detox centre essentially clears a substance out of a person's system, actual treatment may take the form of professional counselling, medication or completely changing your social circle.

Every week, JACS hosts meetings for addicts and their families to anonymously discuss addiction-related issues and then helps people find treatment options.

"Kids have the opportunity here to express themselves," Goldman says.

"If you said 'I have a problem with drugs,' [we will] very quickly refer you to whatever treatment is appropriate."

Hayward, whose son, Benji, lost his life from drugs as a 14-year-old, says addicts and their families take comfort at meetings when they realize so many others are battling the same demons.

"When they come in and start to listen to other people's stories… they feel comfortable," says Hayward.

"When they're ready to speak up, they will."

To reach the JACS 24/7 hotline, call 416-410-JACS, ext. 5227, or visit www.jacstoronto.org.

Numbers affected is significant

"We sold more than 500 tickets for an event with 380 seats!"

It is believed that about 10 per cent of Toronto's Jews have an addiction, and if the number of friends and relatives these addicts have is taken into consideration, the number of people affected by the disease is significant.

"I've never met a person who doesn't know someone affected [by addiction]," Goldman says. "The focus is mostly on drugs and alcohol, but there's also sex, gambling, shopping and much more. We still don't really know how deep it goes."

Goldman emphasizes that while JACS has Jewish dimensions, anyone is welcome to get in touch with them, regardless of how observant they may or may not be.

"A big key word is pluralism," he says. "We're there for every Jew, no matter how involved or unaffiliated they are."

Doctor brings the future to field of rehabilitation

By KYLE GORDON
CJN Intern

RoboNurse, LifeRail and SturdyLift may sound like children's toys, but these devices are actually designed to assist people with disabilities overcome the day-to-day challenges they encounter, particularly later in life.

Dr. Geoff Fernie, vice-president of research at the Toronto Rehabilitation Institute and a professor in the department of surgery, biomedical engineering and rehabilitation at the University of Toronto, has devoted his life to understanding physical and cognitive disabilities and developing technology that helps people faced with these challenges.

Dr. Geoff Fernie

As an undergraduate in England, Fernie had a summer job at a school that was also a hospital for children with disabilities. His interest in providing disabled children with powered artificial limbs came out of that experience.

"I love kids. I fell in love with the whole area. These were challenges that were worth solving to me," Fernie said.

He moved to Canada in 1973 and joined the University of Toronto's department of surgery. Since then, Fernie has taken on countless prestigious positions at various hospitals in Ontario. They include stints as research director at West Park Hospital in Toronto and director of the Centre for Studies in Aging at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre.

Over the past 30 years, Fernie has continued to work on devices to help those with disabilities. His team of students and researchers, Pam Holliday, Gerald Griggs and Brian Maki, have invented many of the mechanical assistant devices that are currently on the market.

RoboNurse, a patient-lifting, positioning and moving machine, was designed by Fernie and his team to reduce caregiver injuries. The lifting device enables patients to be transported from place to place without the limitations of a fixed overhead lift.

"I am proud of everything we have done. I can't dwell on it because there are so many other problems. I am always looking forward," Fernie said.

Currently, Fernie is working to improve the robotic nurse, developing a new toilet system for people in wheelchairs and continuing to test an anti-collision wheelchair, designed to allow patients with dementia to move around without bumping into something or injuring someone, Fernie said.

He is also working on a whole range of infection-control technology for hospitals. If successful, hand-washing equipment will ensure that people's hands are clean when dealing with patients in institutions, he said.

The winter is problematic for people with disabilities. During the cold months, elderly people often experience isolation and their wheelchairs and walkers do not function properly, Fernie said.

"The death rate actually increases by 60 per cent on a cold day," he added.

Fernie and his team of researchers and students are working to improve the living conditions of elderly people during the winter months.

"I still try to keep my hand in the business. I love being a researcher," Fernie said.

First province to regulate midwifery

She added one visit because the baby "was starting to lose weight and show signs of jaundice." To Caro, this is just a small part of the support her midwife offered.

Ontario was the first province to regulate and fund midwifery and create an undergraduate education program, becoming a model for the rest of the world. Even across Canada, there are few universal statndards: it's regulated in some provinces, funded in a few. Here, over seven per cent of births are now attended by midwives, with a client satisfaction rate of over 98 per cent.

Yet, according to the Association of Ontario Midwives, only 57 per cent of women seeking midwives can currently be accommodated. But Premier Dalton McGuinty recently committed an additional $13.8 million, with plans to add 50 new midwives, and Health Minister George Smitherman has said it is a good way "to invest our precious health-care dollars."

Midwifery makes good financial sense: each midwife-assisted hospital birth saves the province about $800 – home births save $1,800 – because there are fewer medical interventions, a C-section rate of 12.7 per cent versus 20.6 per cent for family doctors, and fewer, shorter hospital stays. Rather than the fee-for-service model practised by physicians, midwives receive a flat rate. With more and more physicians leaving the baby-catching business, midwifery will continue to thrive.

"There's no question" she'd have a midwife in future, Caro says, "if there was one available." She's known some people who called too late to get their first choice of midwife or hospital. Women are encouraged to call as soon as they know they're pregnant. No doctor's referral is needed.

For many, like Brooks, midwifery is a second career – a strong personal choice to help women birth their babies. "It's something I'd always wanted to do."

Despite stethoscopes, Dopplers (audio devices for listening to babies in utero) and syringes, as my daughter reminded me, today's midwives are very much the heirs of those dedicated biblical midwives.

We'd like to help your dream of starting a family come true.

York group hosts Israeli filmmaker

By KYLE GORDON
CJN Intern

As part of its ongoing attempt to further peace and tolerance among pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian students, the York University group Shalom-Salam hosted a lecture and screening of the documentary Checkpoint by award-winning Israeli filmmaker Amit Breuer.

"We were interested in finding out why an Israeli-born woman would want to produce a film about checkpoints," Miriam Yosowich, co-president of Shalom-Salam, said at the Jan. 24 event.

Checkpoint, Breuer's feature length film that she produced in 2003, documents the treatment of Palestinian civilians by Israeli soldiers as the Palestinians attempt to pass through checkpoints in the West Bank. Israel says the crossings, which regulate the travel of Palestinians, are in place in order to combat terrorism.

Breuer admitted that when she was first approached to produce the film by director and former checkpoint guard Yoav Shamir, she was hesitant.

"I thought, 'What else can we say.'"

Six months later, Breuer reviewed Shamir's footage and decided that it was important to make Israelis aware of the situation. "We care about improving ourselves as a country," she said.

"The checkpoints are a tragic meeting place for Palestinians and Israelis. I personally hope that these checkpoints will not stay long. They are not necessary," said Breuer.

During the discussion period, an audience member asked Breuer, who moved to Toronto two years ago, if the process of allowing Palestinians to pass through the checkpoints is as arbitrary as the film suggests.

Breuer responded with uncertainty. "I have gotten lots of answers when I've asked," she said.

Often times, she said, decisions about who gets through have to do with rumours circulating about suicide bombers hiding in certain towns. This can cause a checkpoint to close or create delays. Some soldiers try harder than others to let the Palestinians pass, Breuer said, adding that the bottom line is "The policy is not clear."

In the documentary, Palestinians are often denied access simply because soldiers do not feel like allowing them to pass. Palestinian men and boys are frequently detained for hours in inclement weather without food or water, and children without identification are turned away.

Referring to the controversial subject matter and the uneasy response to her film from Jews living outside Israel, Breuer declared, "I don't choose my film subject based on what the majority feels."

Checkpoint has been shown at more than 60 film festivals and has received many awards, including the best international feature award at the 2004 Hotdocs Festival in Toronto and the award for best long documentary at the 2003 International Documentary Festival Amsterdam.

"It's a great achievement. I appreciate everyone who comes to see it. It's not easy to watch," Breuer said.

Renovated Hillel House re-opens

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – An approximately $2-million renovation of Hillel House on Stanley Street has been completed, its first major facelift since the Jewish student organization moved in almost 60 years ago.

The graceful three-storey Victorian home, which is about 120 years old, has had decades of wear and grime peeled away to reveal its pristine plaster ceiling mouldings and ornate woodwork at their best. The majestic banisters, fireplaces and stained-glass windows have also been restored.

But, more importantly for the 400 or 500 young people, primarily McGill and Concordia University students, who pass through its heavy wooden doors each week, Hillel House is now a comfortable, well-equipped place to hold their activities, or to just hang out. Hillel recently showed off its new digs with an open house featuring free hot dogs and beer.

On the ground floor, there's now a spacious lounge with comfy sofas and a large-screen cable television, and Yossi's Dizengoff Cafe has a fully upgraded kitchen and the high-ceilinged dining room has been spruced up and properly lit. In the basement is a chapel and office space. On the second floor are staff offices, a library and computer centre, and a meeting room.

The top floor is a co-ed dormitory which has nine students. Hillel House had been closed since last May when construction began, and programming was held in a variety of venues, including the Centre Hillel near the Université de Montréal. Students in residence lived at the Ghetto Shul, on nearby Lorne Street, which has rooms upstairs.

The Hillel House residence offers a five-day-a-week, lunch-and-dinner kosher meal plan (at Yossi's), as well a a kitchenette for dairy breakfasts and a laundry room.

Aiming to create a dialogue

He said he hopes lectures on radical Islam will inform students and staff, and encourage them "to work together and build bridges rather than work against each other."

Kuperman said that instead of dwelling on events that point fingers at certain groups, Hillel is more interested in promoting gatherings that bring different cultures together, rather than set them apart.

Kuperman said he has been working with U of T's anti-racism and cultural diversity office on a series of interfaith events with other student groups, such as the Muslim Students' Association and the Hindu Students' Council.

"We want to focus on creating a dialogue in hopes that people will see we have a lot more in common," Kuperman said.

Ruth pioneered 'continuum of care' at Baycrest

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Baycrest pioneer Sam Ruth sought out volunteers or asked a colleague to lend a hand on a project, they almost invariably agreed to help.

It wasn't the power of persuasion that engaged them, but rather their understanding that Ruth's request was rooted in looking out for others.

"You couldn't refuse him because you knew that whatever he asked was not for himself, it was for somebody else," says Edwin Goldstein, a past president of the Baycrest board and a longtime colleague of Ruth's.

That legacy of selflessness is being remembered by family, friends and workmates following Ruth's death on Jan. 27 at the age of 84.

Ruth served as Baycrest's executive director from 1956 to 1980 and was the founding president of the Baycrest Centre Foundation, retiring only a few years before he died.

Originally from Chicago, Ruth earned an MBA with a focus on health care from the University of Chicago. After working in Boston and Cleveland, he arrived at Baycrest in the mid-1950s.

"In those days, you warehoused people in homes for the aged and when they got sick, you took them to the hospital," reflects Norman Schipper, a lawyer and honorary director at Baycrest who knew Ruth for 60 years.

"That led Sam to his thesis of continuum of care, whereby when someone gets admitted to a home for the aged, they can stay and get continuous care."

Indeed, when Ruth first arrived at Baycrest, the facility was essentially a small home for the aged. He fundamentally altered that approach, spearheading the construction of an on-site hospital and numerous geriatric programs that enabled residents to receive comprehensive care throughout their time at Baycrest.

"He tried to take care of older people right through until the time of their last days, looking after them with dignity," says Goldstein. "That was innovative at that time."

Ruth's innovations caught the attention of other ethnic communities, such as Chinese and Italian, as well as government agencies and academics, who came to him for expertise.

He helped other communities establish their own care facilities for seniors, was chair of the advisory committee of Metro Toronto Homes for the Aged, was an assistant professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto and also acted as a government health-ministry consultant.

"Sam looked at geriatrics very differently than most people," says Schipper. "He felt older people had full lives to live and there was a quality of life they could maintain."

This was not just an idealistic credo, but a practice Ruth personified.

"At the age of 80, Sam rode his bike in the Barrie-to-Baycrest fundraiser," says Stephen Herbert, president and CEO of Baycrest. "He was determined to ride his age in kilometers and trained over many months to prepare himself for the event."

On a hot summer day, sitting on an antique bike with crumpled tires, Ruth ventured on this challenging journey.

"He did over 50 kilometres that day," marvels Stan Feldman, Ruth's riding partner. "That was incredible."

At work and in his personal life, Ruth loved communicating with and being around other people, a trait that won him many important friends.

"You couldn't help but have a personal relationship with Sam," says Schipper.

"It didn't matter if you were on the board or were the chairman, he was a fellow that treated you like a friend, not as an employee."

Ruth is survived by wife Nancy, sons and daughter-in-law Alan, John, Daniel and Fern and grandchildren Jessica, Alexandra, Matthew, Kyle, Sean and Jaclyn.

'Canada in step with every single country in western world'

"What we do now depends on what the quartet asks us to do," he said. "I hope they will ask us to stay."

The World Bank chairs the committee of donors for the West Bank and Gaza, which disburses about $1 billion (US) a year to the Palestinian Authority.

Despite the aid, the PA is said to be bankrupt.

The 25-member EU, which is the largest single donor to the Palestinian Authority, last year contributed 500 million Euros ($606 million US). The Europeans recently suspended some of that aid to protest the PA's financial mismanagement and corruption.

The PA receives more than $200 million annually from the United States. Following the win by Hamas, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was quoted as saying, "We're obviously not going to give aid to a terrorist organization."

CIDA said it is reviewing its annual assistance package to the PA of $25 million (Cdn) and an additional $37 million pledged last year by former Prime Minister Paul Martin.

The agency issued the following written statement to The CJN: "In light of the Palestinian election result, Canadian assistance programs in the West Bank and Gaza are currently being reviewed. We cannot provide any further information at this time."

Foreign Affairs spokesperson Marie-Christine Lilkoff confirmed that the assistance programs are being reviewed.

"Canada remains committed to the goal of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East, and the creation of a sovereign, independent, viable, territorially contiguous Palestinians state living side by side in peace and security with Israel," she said. "As a matter of government policy, Canadian government officials are instructed to avoid contact with known members of Hamas. That policy remains in place."

Canada blacklisted Hamas as a terrorist group in 2002, so funding it would violate Ottawa's own Anti-Terrorism Act.

Since 2000, CIDA's annual allocation to the West Bank and Gaza, Palestinian refugees in the region and other "regional initiatives" has included $10 million a year toward the general budget of UNRWA – the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees – to provide basic health, education and social services.

In October 2004, Canada said it would continue to fund UNRWA even after its head admitted that some of its employees were Hamas members.

Last May, Martin promised $12.2 million to Mahmoud Abbas during the PA president's visit to Ottawa. In September, Martin offered his congratulations on the Israeli pullout from Gaza and pledged an additional $24.5 million to the PA.

Both those pledges are now being reassessed.

It's not known whether CIDA was responding to the position articulated by Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who was sworn in on Monday. Following the Hamas win, Harper said that for a nation "to be truly democratic, that nation must renounce any use of terrorism."

And in a conference call with Jewish leaders prior to the election, Harper said the Conservatives "led the charge" to have Hamas listed as a terrorist organization and that the Tories "have taken a very hard line on Hamas."

He called the "advocacy of terror and the establishment of a stable democracy incompatible."

Given Harper's comments, and a "sea change" in the Middle East political landscape, Canada had little choice but to reassess its aid, said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee.

"Canada is entirely in step with every single country in the western world that is confronted with the same dilemma, namely, a desire to provide assistance to the Palestinian people, but who can't countenance the political representation that has emerged," Fogel said.

"At this point, it is impossible to see how they can reconcile those two imperatives, the one being recognizing that Palestinian people are in many respects suffering and in need of assistance, and the other, not wanting to send mixed signals about what conditions are necessary for an engagement of political leadership," he added.

Even 12 years ago, countries said they could not engage the Palestine Liberation Organization, Fogel said. "Now they're faced with the same set of circumstances, but with a leadership that seems to be less preoccupied with how they're received in the West."

The Associated Press quoted a senior Hamas official as saying that the Islamic group is already looking for new sources of funding after the international community reassessed its aid, warning that Hamas will not be "blackmailed."

Part of Canada's package in 2005 was a $6.3 million housing rehabilitation project in partnership with the PA's Ministry of Public Works and Housing and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp.

UTT firebomber will be paroled in May

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

United Talmud Torahs (UTT) firebomber Sleiman El Merhebi will have to avoid people involved in "activist movements" after he is released this May, according to a Jan. 25 decision by the National Parole Board.

The parole board has imposed a special condition prohibiting El Merhebi from meeting or communicating with "persons known by legal proceedings as having been involved in activist movements." He must also stay away from anyone with a criminal record.

El Merhebi must by law be paroled in May, because he will have served two-thirds of his 24-month prison term.

In January 2005, he was given the equivalent of 40 months behind bars for the UTT arson, which was judged to have been a hate crime. The eight months he was held in custody from the time of his arrest in May 2004 counted as 16 months, leaving 24 months to be served in a federal penitentiary.

The conditions of his parole apply until January 2007, the end of his full sentence, which he received after pleading guilty to reduced charges.

The Montreal school's library was firebombed overnight in April 2004, causing heavy damage.

The parole board cautions that El Merhebi, now 20, remains an "influenceable young man with a high level of unpredictability."

In his favour, however, the board says he has no prior convictions, has behaved well while in prison, and has positive support awaiting him when he is released.

"Your behaviour before the offences and since your incarceration shows your capacity to respect the rules of life in society. The principal factor contributing to your criminality was the influence of negative persons," the decision states.

El Merhebi's request for day parole or early conditional release was turned down last July.

In its explanation of that decision, the parole board said El Merhebi had been under the influence of a man described by police as a "known activist" who was never apprehended in the firebombing case due to "technical reasons."

El Merhebi testified that he set the fire at UTT because he was upset by Israel's assassination the previous month of Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin. An anonymous note was taped to the door of the school threatening more serious violence against the Jewish community if Israel's "crimes" continued.

El Merhebi was born in Lebanon and came to Montreal at age seven. He was described at his sentencing as a non-observant Muslim.

Up to the point of the July review of his case, the parole board said, El Merhebi had refused to provide any information to police about the individual in question, except to acknowledge that he had been encouraged by him.

His request for parole was rejected at that time because the parole board reckoned there were "reasonable grounds to believe" he would "commit an infraction accompanied by violence before the expiration of his sentence," noting that he continues to react emotionally to events in the Middle East.

El Merhebi was described as immature, impulsive, short-tempered and susceptible to "the influence of people more fanatical than you."

El Merhebi is being held in a medium-security federal penitentiary. Richard Vachon, a parole board communications officer, said he could not disclose which one it is.

The fate of El Merhebi's mother, also accused in the crime, remains to be decided. Rouba Fahd El Merhebi pleaded not guilty in December 2004 to being an accessory after the fact. She has been free on bail since her arrest in May 2004.

She allegedly tried to buy an air ticket to Brazil for her son after the crime was committed. The main evidence, her call to a travel agent, was gathered through a police wiretap.

Her next court date is scheduled for May 15. The delay in her case has been partly explained by the sheer volume of wiretapping that was recorded at the El Merhebi household.

The day news of El Merhebi's parole broke, Jewish People's & Peretz School evacuated some 500 elementary students after receiving a threatening phone call at around 1 p.m. Police found nothing dangerous and said they would step up patrols in the area.

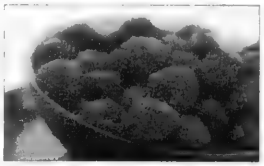
Kashruth requires produce to be checked for bugs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ensuring that our fruits and vegetables are kosher has been a constant chore in the past few years, says Rabbi Tsvi Heber, rabbinic co-ordinator for the Kashruth Council of Canada.



Bug infestation, which renders produce non-kosher, has increased tremendously since the ban on the pesticide DDT, he says, and if the produce is not inspected thoroughly and cleaned properly, it could be treif.

Rabbi Heber, who lectures to local groups about the vegetable cleaning process, says many people are skeptical about calling fruits and vegetables non-kosher because they cannot see any bugs, "but they're there. They often hide inside and we cannot see them.

"The produce is [nutritious], though, and we don't want people to throw it away. Our goal is to teach [consumers to inspect and clean their fruits and vegetables], not to prohibit them from eating them."

The topic of bug infestation isn't new to Judaism, he says. "The Torah states [in Vayikra 11:41-44] that we are prohibited from eating any type of insect. It wasn't always such a problem, though, because for many years farmers were using insecticide, which succeeded in wiping out most insects from fruits and vegetables.

"The tides turned, however, when the U.S. Environment Protection Agency banned DDT in 1972. By the 1990s [more] insecticides were banned so infestation increased.

"The government has a tolerance level by which infested produce is still safe to eat, but in terms of kashruth there is a zero tolerance. It took us a while to adapt to the new reality, but in the past few years we have become active with regards to this issue, and we have developed a policy."

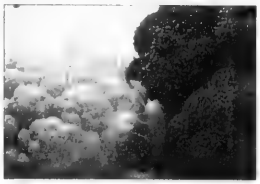
Bugs are here to stay, says Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council, "but we don't eat them."

Caterers, particularly, are under a lot of pressure to ensure their produce is bug-free, says Rabbi Levin, because they deal in such large quantities.

In that vein, he says, although there is no produce that is absolutely prohibited from eating, there are items that cannot be used in a catering establishment because it would be prohibitive to check them in a timely manner

These items include artichoke leaves and hearts, blackberries, brussels sprouts, curly leaf spinach, fresh broccoli, mesclun mix, curly parsley, raspberries and watercress.

In the case of broccoli, bugs like aphids, thrips or spider mites can be lodged in the floret head or at the base of the underpart area connecting the floret to the stem. With blackberries, insects are nestled in the crevices.



"[We want to stress] that people can use these things at home because they will have the time to check them properly," Rabbi Levin says.

Other produce, including bok choy, romaine lettuce, flat leaf and baby spinach, napa cabbage and open leaf lettuce can be used by caterers, but are subject to a clearly defined cleaning process that includes checking with a magnifying glass, and in some instances a specially designed light box.

"It's a lot of work but we'll get used to it. Anything new is hard. We want people to feel comfortable that things are being done properly," he says.

David Berk, partner of Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers with Rabbi Yitzchok Drookman and Walter Vaz, says that the "bug" problem is North American-wide, and kosher caterers across the continent are dealing with the same issues.

"It's not that the [prohibited] vegetables are not kosher – it's just too hard for the mashgiach to check each piece."

Berk says the cleaning process is not a burden. "It's what we do. It's part of our philosophy as a kosher caterer – it's our responsibility to follow kashruth to the 'k.'"

Vaz says he understands why kashruth agencies have to be strict. "The marketplace has grown so tremendously [that] the highest standards have to be in place.

"The community has grown, and people expect us to follow Halachah [to the letter]. They want us to take the high road. We can't be half kosher."
